Conference on anti-Semitism a 'success'

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada's foreign minister has pronounced last week's international conference on anti-Semitism, held in Berlin, a "success," if no other reason than it continued "sensitizing" people and nations to the dangers of anti-Jewish prejudice.

In a CJN telephone interview from Washington, D.C., where Bill Graham was accompanying Prime Minister Paul Martin in meetings with U.S. President George W. Bush, the foreign minister praised the two-day conference for moving the issue of anti-Semitism "to an international level."

Foreigh Minister Bill Graham lauds Berlin gathering

Graham said "one of the most important" things to come out of the 55-nation gathering was the fact it is part of a process started by the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe (OSCE), "which has a presence in so many eastern European states where we have to worry about anti-Semitism."

He said the fact the conference "raised consciousness in bringing together a number of ministers – indicating [the] seriousness with which we treat this – was in itself an important objective."

For Canada, the conference "was first and foremost an opportunity for us to reaffirm our fight against anti-Semitism… We were frank in our speech. We have our problems in Canada and we want to commit ourselves to fighting them in Canada and we believe that we should be working with our international partners to do that."

Microscopic computer identifies, destroys cancer

By YUVAL DROR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

REHOVOT — Researchers from the Weizmann Institute of Science have developed a prototype biological computer that identifies and diagnoses cancerous cells and then releases medication to destroy them.

The results, to be published in the upcoming issue of the journal Nature, were presented last week by the head of the research team, Prof. Ehud Shapiro, at a news conference in Brussels.

The team first reported the development of their microscopic molecular computer, which is built of synthetic DNA and various enzymes, in November 2001. However, Shapiro said, that was "a toy computer that didn't know how to do anything medically or computationally significant. This time, we are demonstrating a real use that could have medical applications."

The computer makes its diagnoses by testing the concentration of mRNA molecules in the fluid surrounding it, as changes in the quantity of mRNA often indicate the presence of cancerous cells. Once it detects the existence of a cancer, it performs additional tests to determine what kind of cancer is involved, and then releases the appropriate medication to cause the cancerous cells to self-destruct.

Shul Says Thanks

KITCHENER — About 700 people of all faiths came to the Beth Jacob Congregation here on April 23 for an event organized by the shul to thank the local community for its support after vandals overturned 12 headstones in the synagogue's cemetery over Passover. Among those in the standing-room-only crowd were Community Safety Minister Monte Kwinter and Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. Beth Jacob's cemetery is the only Jewish burial ground in Waterloo Region.

Polish Treasure Found

TORONTO — Mark Biederman, a southwestern Ontario horse veterinarian and son of a Holocaust survivor, has recovered a cache of gold coins that his family buried in Poland during the war. Last month, Israeli investigative journalist Yaron Svoray, who had been working with Biederman, found the 63 old gold coins, dating as far back as 1703, that the family buried in a ceramic pot beside their home in Lodz. Biederman, 43, was planning to fly to Poland last week to retrieve the coins, which are said to be worth a fortune.

New High School

VANCOUVER — Construction began last week on a new building for Vancouver's Jewish community high school. The Vancouver Talmud Torah High School, the Jewish Community Centre of Greater Vancouver and the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver have raised more than $18 million for the project, but need another $2 million to help cover ongoing operations, officials said. Some $13 million of the overall cost is for land and construction, while $7 million will help pay the school's bills in first few years and go to an endowment to cover future costs. The building is slated to open next year.

Students Meet Lantos

WINNIPEG — Some 330 students from across Canada were to meet earlier this week with Representative Robert Lantos, the only Holocaust survivor ever elected to the U.S. Congress, at the United States Holocaust Memorial in Washington, D.C. They are among the more than 3,000 Canadian students from various backgrounds who have participated in the Winnipeg-based Asper Foundation Human Rights and Holocaust Studies Program since its inception in 1997. Participants, who have come from 39 Canadian cities and nine provinces, take an 18-hour course on the Holocaust and human rights that was developed for the foundation. They then head to Washington to visit the Holocaust museum and other rights monuments. Almost 700 students are making the journey this spring.

Claims Conference Notices

NEW YORK — Heirs to deceased Holocaust survivors who applied for payment under the Claims Conference program for former slave and forced labourers before the Dec. 31, 2001, deadline must notify the Claims Conference by phone, e-mail, mail or fax no later than May 15 of their intent to pursue the application. This applies even to people who have already contacted the Claims Conference on the matter.

For details or to respond, visit claimscon.org, e-mail heirdeadline@claimscon.org, call 646-536-9100, fax 212-685-5299, or write 15 East 26 St., Room 906, New York, N.Y., 10010.

In other news, Jewish victims of Nazi persecution from certain European countries and from Hungary may now be eligible to receive monthly payments from the Claims Conference's Article 2 Fund and the Central and Eastern European Fund (CEEF). An estimated 4,000 Holocaust survivors may benefit. For details, see the above contacts, or e-mail the Claims Conference at info@claimscon.org.

El Al Bomb Scare

LONDON — Heathrow Airport was partly evacuated after a bomb scare at the El Al desk last week. Terminal One was partly evacuated while police attended to a suspicious package left at the airline's ticket counter. The package was found to be harmless.

Berlin Bomb Scare

BERLIN — A bomb scare last week at the Hilton hotel here shook up delegations preparing for an international conference on anti-Semitism. The alarm, which followed an anonymous call to police at about 5:30 p.m., was lifted when no explosives were found in a four-hour search. The hotel was cleared of more than 400 guests and 80 personnel while a team of 150 police with bomb-sniffing dogs searched the hotel and neighbouring streets were closed off.

Argentine Passion

BUENOS AIRES — The Passion of the Christ is the No. 1 movie in Argentina. Mel Gibson's film on the last hours of Jesus has sold more than two million tickets in Argentina since it opened five weeks ago.

Supremacist Convicted

CHICAGO — White supremacist Matt Hale was found guilty last week of planning to murder a federal judge. Hale, leader of the World Church of the Creator, was convicted in a federal court of solicitation of murder and three counts of obstruction of justice. Hale arranged for a man to kill Judge Joan Lefkow after she ruled against him in a trademark case. The judge wasn't harmed.

Jewish Student Targeted

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — The car of an Indiana University Jewish student who is an active member of the university's Hillel found his car covered in red, spray-painted swastikas last week, with the word "Jew" written on the car's side, the Indiana Daily Student newspaper reported. The victim, who wanted his name withheld, reported the crime to police.

Conference hears strategies on making Jesus more attractive to Jews

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Jews for Jesus-type groups in Canada are promising to redouble their efforts and adopt new strategies – including outreach to children – to convince "unsaved" and "perishing" Jewish communities that Jesus is their Lord and messiah, a conference on evangelizing to Jews heard in Toronto last week.

In fact, Canada is fertile ground – though not as much as the United States – for spreading the Christian gospels and bringing Jews to Jesus, about 50 leading lights of the so-called messianic Jewish movement from North, central and South America heard.

The conference, dubbed "Training for Jewish Evangelism," didn't attempt to hide participants' efforts to convert Jews to Christianity. Books, tapes, CDs and other material were plain in their aim to win as many Jewish souls for Jesus as possible.

The two-day gathering at a local hotel was presented by the Lausanne Consultation on Jewish Evangelism, a task force formed in 1980 in Thailand "so that more Jewish people will hear and consider the Good News of Jesus," according to a brochure.

Messianic Jews, or Hebrew-Christians, say they are Jewish and engage in Jewish worship. They believe one can be Jewish and believe in Jesus. In fact, some of the men at the conference wore kippot, as do many in the movement.

Some of the ideas aired to make Jesus more palatable to Jews included allowing Jewish communities to retain their cultural values and permitting synagogues to keep their language of worship, all while gently steering them toward Jesus. Messianic Jews, meanwhile, must develop a manner that will lead them to be seen as legitimate members of the Jewish community.

The CJN was alerted to the conference by Jews for Judaism, and a reporter attended the session on messianic activities in Canada, a country described as a "welcoming yet challenging place to spread the gospel to my people," said Andrew Barron, director of Toronto-based Jews for Jesus, Canada.

Canada's policy of multiculturalism "fosters intransigence" toward his work, said Barron. He estimated there are fewer than 1,000 Jewish "believers" in Canada, 47 of whom have converted in the past eight years.

"That's too few. It's disappointing. I believe we can do better," he said.

He said last summer's contentious Behold Your God campaign in Toronto, when dozens of missionaries hit the city's streets, only emboldened messianics. Barron said an evangelical leader told him that Jewish outrage at the campaign was "a sign that we were doing something right."

Barron said that after encountering one Jewish protest outside a nursing home during last summer's campaign, "we went door-to-door in the nursing home and got a lot of contacts."

Jews for Jesus in Canada "is small, but we're getting the gospel heard more than ever. My mission is to continue to encourage Jewish believers. My commitment is to recruit so that the sowing and reaping will continue."

Larry Rich, Canadian director of Chosen People Ministries, told the conference his organization operates in Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg, and hopes to branch out to Vancouver soon.

He described his group's 64-year history in this country as "up and down." The United States, he said, seems to offer more fertile ground when it comes to attracting Jews.

Maytal Wax-Leiderman – The will to live ...

Maytal was at the The Dizengoff Center in Tel Aviv celebrating Purim. At 15:55 a loud explosion pierced the air. This terrorist attack changed the course of the 27-year-old's life instantly. The attack killed her brother Asaf and left Maytal with only one shattered leg and an entire body covered with burns. She was unconscious for twelve days and spent three months thereafter on a respirator.

"I wanted to live so badly. They didn't know whether I would make it through the first night. Each day was a struggle to live."

But the will to live is stronger than anything else for Maytal.

She and her husband had recently bought a walk-up apartment with a lovely garden. After this horrific incident they could not live there as it was physically impossible for her to walk up and down the stairs. Unfortunately, her marriage also suffered. "What began as young innocent love turned into a relationship of caregiver and caretaker, and that was not healthy. I had gone from being independent to a state of helplessness."

The struggle to rehabilitate has been a long and painful process for Maytal. She now works as a librarian at the university and has started going out with friends again. It is at Beit Halochem where Maytal participates in wheelchair dancing, sculpture and painting.

Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel, Beit Halochem Canada reaches out to 50,000 disabled veterans of Israel and victims of terror – giving them the best care and rehabilitation they deserve.

Maytal will perform with the Hora Galgalim wheelchair dancers June 1 in Montreal and June 3 in Toronto at Beit Halochem Canada's "Celebration of Life" concerts. Tickets: 416-787-8950 or 1-800-355-1648.

Anti-Semitism discussed

From the editor's desk

There are, essentially, two broad reasons for our concern with any manifestations of anti-Semitism: the inherent offence and vulgarity of the act and the underlying danger it portends for the targeted community of Jews and for society at large.

Over the past two millennia, Jews around the world have developed acutely sensitive antennae that hone in on the unmistakable, scratchy signals that herald the ill winds of anti-Semitism.

Forged in the fiery experiences of Jewish history, the antennae are trustworthy. We rely on them for our own sake and for the sake of the societies of which we are an integral part. They are not the instruments of victimology; they are, rather, the instruments of defence.

One of the especially positive aspects of the conference on anti-Semitism held last week in Berlin by the 55-member Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe was its starting point: the recognition and acknowledgment that the recent increase in anti-Semitism poses a threat to everyone and not just to Jews.

Hosted by German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer and chaired by Bulgarian Foreign Minister Solomon Passy, the two-day program featured the participation of a large cast of dignitaries including Israeli President Moshe Katsav, German President Johannes Rau, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell, Canadian Foreign Minister Bill Graham and other invited, non-governmental guests such as Holocaust survivors Simone Veil and Elie Wiesel.

It is difficult to assess the long-term results of the conference. It had no legal status. Moreover, the usual realpolitik intervened to ensure that some "punches were pulled." For example, the conference failed to identify the main known perpetrators of the rising anti-Semitism in Europe, or even to condemn its ominous growth among European Muslims. But, as Shelley Klein, director of advocacy for Hadassah-WIZO told the Jewish Telegraphic Agency (JTA), at a time when public opinion in much of the world has turned sharply against Israel, a gathering intended to help the Jewish people was "a success in and of itself." And, as JTA reported, the conference organizers did declare "unambiguously that international developments or political issues, including those in Israel or elsewhere in the Middle East, never justify anti-Semitism."

Those "political issues in Israel" were presented to the conference very eloquently by Katsav.

"Sometimes we feel that Europeans are not ready to feel solidarity with us or to recognize the suffering of the Israeli people from the terrible terrorism, which has continued for many years. The brutality of the terrorism in the Middle East is of a type that humanity has never seen before.

"It is only by co-operation – with determination and with leadership – that we can overcome this hatred…

"The anti-Semitism in Europe is a result of the co-operation among elements who are against the West and western values, who are against globalization and against progress, as well as extremists from the left and right and from organizations of radical Muslims… In Europe, there are 20 million Muslims. Most of them are very good people who desire to live calm and normal lives. However, they are afraid to raise their voices against the extremists. I call on the moderate Muslims in Europe, and on their leaders, to co-operate with us in encouraging tolerance and understanding for a free and better world…"

Katsav drew a very clear picture of the threat posed to all of European society by the purveyors of anti-Semitism.

"Anti-Semitism is encouraged and is given inspiration by international terrorism… and is a great danger to democracy and to freedom in the world. Where synagogues are burnt, the day will come when stones will be thrown on parliament and democracy is in danger."

In his 12 pages of remarks, Katsav made many important points. One of the most compelling affirmed the significance of the very existence of a sovereign Jewish state. "We do not want to prevent legitimate political criticism against Israel government policy, but we will not tolerate incitement against world Jewry and the Jewish state."

The perfidy of anti-Semitism was also officially condemned last week closer to home. For the first time ever, the benchers of the august body of the Law Society of Upper Canada adopted a motion condemning this unique form of bigotry. Gary Gottlieb, Q.C., was the driving force behind the Law Society's initiative, which one hopes will lead to the implementation of meaningful, effective policies against anti-Semitic behaviours and practices and which will serve as a model to other professional regulatory bodies in Canada.

But lest our hopefulness and our optimism too quickly overpower our realism, our antennae at the end of the week once again crackled with stomach-turning, sordid signals.

The Beth Zion Congregation in Oshawa was defaced with offensive words and symbols, including a swastika drawn on a Holocaust memorial plaque at the synagogue's entrance and the community was once again outraged.

But our outrage is a mere momentary indulgence if it does not lead to action. We must act if we are to be true to our faith and our heritage and to the values of the society in which that faith and heritage flourish.

Law society urged to deal with anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Jewish bencher of the Law Society of Upper Canada says the "tentacles" of anti-Semitism have infiltrated the legal profession and he has introduced a motion that calls on the society's governing body to takes steps to address the problem.

The convocation of the Law Society, the organization's parliamentary body, has referred the motion to two committees for study.

The motion, introduced by Gary Gottlieb, calls on the society's equity and aboriginal issues committee and its government relations committee to recommend to convocation ways the Law Society can "discourage anti-Semitism and all forms of hatred and discrimination in our profession" and elsewhere. It also asks for recommendations on ways to promote "religious tolerance and respect in our profession" and elsewhere.

Gottlieb, who has served as a bencher for nine years, said he introduced the motion because "it always troubled me that the issue of anti-Semitism had been ignored by the equity committee."

The committee has studied gender, racial and sexual orientation issues – along with most of the other prohibited categories of discrimination set out in provincial and federal human rights legislation. But anti-Semitism was never addressed, he said.

"Anti-Semitism waxes and wanes, but it is always there. It's always bubbling below the surface. Incidents have been brought to my attention by lawyers and others, but no one want to make waves. But the problem is not going to disappear," he said.

In presenting the motion, Gottlieb, a columnist for the Law Times, noted "this is the first time in the 207-year history of the society that an observant Jewish bencher has stood in front of convocation and asked his fellow benchers to play a role in combating the wave of hatred of the Jews that is sweeping the world and that has put its tentacles into our profession."

Gottlieb outlined several recent incidents he believes are indicative of the anti-Jewish sentiment among fellow lawyers. Once, during a discipline hearing for a lawyer's anti-Semitic remarks, he said, a colleague told him, "I hear these remarks all the time. They're not going to say them in front of you. You're Jewish."

On another occasion, after obtaining convocation's agreement to avoid scheduling meetings on the Jewish Sabbath or holidays, a bencher visited him unannounced, berated him and called the accommodation an imposition.

In another example, Gottlieb referred to a letter he received from a non-Jewish colleague that described a party at which the hostess made blatantly anti-Semitic remarks that her husband and family supported.

And in yet another incident revealed by Gottlieb, a visibly Orthodox Jewish colleague was denied a position with a firm and was told by one of its senior members that "his appearance frightened the receptionist; he wouldn't fit in."

The lawyer, who was just starting out, didn't want to take his grievance to the Law Society and didn't want to make waves, Gottlieb said.

"Many in the Jewish community don't want to bring attention to ourselves, and that's an attitude I understand, but I totally disagree with it.

"We have noting to be ashamed of and we should be proud to be Jewish and it's about time Jewish people spoke up for their rights. We're not asking for special treatment, we're asking for equal treatment, for the respect and dignity we're entitled to, whether we're lawyers or private individuals."

Gottlieb said he believed anti-Semitism "exists in the legal profession and is likely to be more submerged than in other areas, because lawyers are sensitive to the fact it's totally inappropriate and they know they'll be disciplined. They're more prudent."

Gottlieb hopes his motion will draw the attention of his profession to the issue. "We haven't raised the sensitivity level to make it politically incorrect to be an anti-Semite."

Gottlieb expects the society committees "will decide on appropriate measure to be taken to implement the philosophy and sentiments behind the motion." Those recommendations would likely be modelled on current society activities, including education programs and commemorative events, he added.

A Law Society spokesperson wouldn't comment last week on the claim that anti-Semitism has its "tentacles" in the legal profession and senior society officials were unavailable.

Vandals strike at Oshawa synagogue

The Beth Zion Synagogue in Oshawa last week became the latest Canadian Jewish institution subjected to anti-Semitic vandalism.

On Thursday afternoon, Rabbi Aaron Mitnick discovered several swastikas and slogans daubed with a black marker on the downtown shul.

A Holocaust memorial was defaced with a swastika and swastikas were found on windows on the west side of the building and on an adjacent shed. In addition the phrases "Hitler is God is Hitler," "Sons of the Gestapo" and "Einsatzgruppen A" were written on the shed.

Rabbi Mitnick said finding the graffiti "was very disturbing… but not surprising given what's going on."

Rabbi Mitnick said police responded quickly, with Durham Regional Police Chief Kevin McAlpine visiting the synagogue and condemning the incident.

Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario regional chair, Ed Morgan, said the incident at the Beth Zion "is a sordid continuation of the anti-Semitic activities that have affected us in Ontario and elsewhere in the country."

Ten years ago, a swastika was painted on the front door of the synagogue, but no arrests were made at the time. – P.L.

Israel's strategic situation is good, Mideast analyst says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's strategic position has rarely been better, but dangers loom large, says Israeli political analyst Efraim Inbar, director of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University.

In a recent speech sponsored by Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University, Inbar cited Israel's enduring peace treaty with Egypt and Israel's increasingly intimate relationship with the United States – the world's sole superpower – since Sept. 11 as positive indicators.

Israel is also stronger because the Arab world is weaker and Iraq has been de-fanged, he added.

But Inbar warned that Iran's quest for weapons of mass destruction is a worrisome development, and he said the upsurge of anti-Semitism and a campaign to delegitimize Israel are troublesome trends.

Delivering the Arnold and Leona Finkler Memorial Lecture at Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Inbar ranged far and wide as he discussed Israel's gains and the threats it still faces.

Israel's peace treaty with Egypt – the single most important Arab state – has neutralized the Arab world's ability to wage a large-scale war against Israel, noted Inbar, a professor of political studies at Bar-Ilan.

Although the treaty has produced a disappointing cold peace, it has been a stabilizing force that has withstood three major tests – Palestinian uprisings in 1987 and 2000, and Israel's destruction of Iraq's nuclear reactor in 1981.

Egypt will live up to its treaty obligations, at least as long as the United States remains a global hegemonic power, Inbar said.

In a reference to Syria, he said the Syrians have declined militarily since the dissolution of the Soviet Union in 1991. But Syria will try to bleed Israel by using Hezbollah as a surrogate.

The status quo defining current relations between Israel and Syria is "very beneficial" to Israel. "Basically, Syria and Israel have reached a modus vivendi."

In his judgment, Syria is not interested in reaching a peace accord with Israel.

Turning to Israel's ties with Washington, Inbar said Israel is very fortunate to count the United States as an ally. Since Sept. 11, Israel has succeeded in deepening its friendship with the United States.

Efraim Inbar

The decline of the Arab bloc has also strengthened Israel. "The Arab world is basically in shambles, which is good for Israel."

The collapse of the Arab economic boycott of Israel has been beneficial as well, he pointed out.

"Iraq, fortunately, is no longer a challenge," Inbar went on to say. "The Americans took care of Iraq."

Praising Israel's political and military relationship with Turkey as a definite plus, Inbar said the two countries share common interests.

Iran is "extremely dangerous and its quest for a nuclear arsenal constitutes "an existential threat" to Israel, he said.

This issue must be treated with the utmost urgency, and Israel should spare no effort to counter Iran's aspirations. He suggested that Israel may have no alternative but to try to destroy Iran's nuclear program and eliminate the scientists working on it.

Citing the resurgence of anti-Semitism around the world and the growing chorus of voices questioning Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state, Inbar said these trends may well have dire long-term consequences.

Claiming there is no chance to reach a stable peace agreement with the Palestinian Authority, and dismissing the Oslo accords as "strategic folly," Inbar urged Israel to "manage" its dispute with the Palestinians.

"We are doomed to continue, at various levels of violence, this conflict with the Palestinians."

Asserting that a Palestinian state would be "problematic" for Israeli security interests, Inbar said the Palestinians are incapable of reaching even a "cold peace" with Israel.

The Palestinians fervently believe they were robbed of their land and tenaciously cling to the belief they have a right to return to their former homes in Israel, he said.

Describing Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat as a terrorist who incites attacks against Israel, Inbar sharply questioned his suitability as a negotiating partner.

Palestinian society has grown weary of the intifadah, but extremists set the agenda, Inbar argued.

In closing, Inbar said Israel's "strategic environment" is good at present, though Israel will probably continue to face low-intensity conflicts with the Palestinians and Hezbollah.

"Terrorism is the weapon of the weak. Our situation, strategically, is better than in the past. But we have to be ready for the worst while hoping for the best."

The prime minister loses his party

No one has suggested that the outcome of the Likud party referendum Sunday was decisively influenced by the latest atrocity committed by Palestinian terrorists. Nearly 60 per cent of the members of the party who voted – 51.5 per cent of the membership – soundly rejected Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza disengagement plan.

But the night before the referendum, the cold-blooded shooting murder of 34-year-old Tali Hatuel of Gush Katif, eight months pregnant, and her four daughters Hila, 11, Hadar, 9, Roni, 7, and Merav, 2, merely confirmed in the minds of the already-convinced majority of Likud voters that leaving Gaza in the face of continued terror would be to surrender to that terror. That their party's leader and the president of the United States were of opposite minds did not persuade them.

It is no exaggeration to say now Sharon has lost his party. But has he lost his government? And can he govern without the support of his party? Sharon said he would respect the referendum's results. How he can do that while still pushing forward with his U.S.-backed policies remains to be seen. As of this writing, Sharon had not yet consulted with his coalition partners nor had he addressed the public. The course of the near future is not clear.

In a statement that could jeopardize his own standing within the party, Deputy Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told reporters that the Likud vote does not prove Sharon's policy is wrong. There is no choice but to implement the disengagement plan, he emphasized.

Shinui party leader and key coalition partner, Yossi Lapid, reinforced Olmert's point of view, saying the government was still obliged to proceed with the disengagement policy as long as it held the support of a majority in the Knesset. Lapid also warned that a reversal of policy now would harm Israel's credibility with the U.S. administration. Shimon Peres, leader of the Opposition, said it was time for the Labor party to bring about new elections.

Sharon has said he will not resign. But the calls for him to do so began immediately after the referendum results were known. Meretz MK Zahava Gal-On said she would immediately initiate a bill to dissolve the Knesset.

Through all this uncertainty, the Palestinians have once again demonstrated their remarkable penchant for perpetuating their misery. PA Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia expressed the hope that Sharon's defeat "would be an incentive to go back to the right path to ensure the establishment of a Palestinian state."

But neither Qureia nor any PA leader has yet to step foot on the only path that would lead to a Palestinian state – namely, taking the first tentative measures aimed at dismantling the terrorist infrastructure. A good starting point would be Islamic Jihad which, after claiming responsibility with other terrorist groups, for the slaughter of Hatuel and her four children, vowed to carry out more attacks on Israelis.

Standing up for Hillel

We were disheartened to read Joanne Cohen's article ("Time to rethink campus strategy," CJN, April 22) and feel that it's important for the community to realize that her opinion is not shared by all who are involved with Jewish advocacy. As students who are active in Hillel at York University, we would like to shed some light on Hillel's everyday activities, those not provocative enough to make the headlines.

Hillel is a well-established international organization for Jewish campus life, and its cultural, educational, recreational and even political advocacy programming would be inaccurately described as militant. Its programs are often praised as being all-encompassing and positive, not only by the Jewish campus community, but also by the larger campus community.

Hillel is responsible for annual arts festivals, weekly hands-on visual arts initiatives, and daily educational programs with community rabbis. Hillel also hosts intramural athletic programs, pub nights and Shabbat dinners. It prides itself on its Israel affairs programming, which caters to a variety of political views and general interests. It is preposterous to describe Zionist initiatives on campus as "militant" when programming and speakers frequently address such topics as "women in Israel," "eco-Zionism" and the diversity of Israel's population.

When we find out that a group on campus is preparing a provocative attack against views that hit very close to home, it should not be expected that we will merely sit back and allow such an event to take place without defending our values. The fact that it is mainly uninvolved Jewish students who come out of the woodwork to join Hillel in demonstrating their pro-Israel stance not only proves the rationale behind Hillel, it has also led to immense Jewish pride on campus. It would have been disturbing if there was no unified Jewish response that defends our values and beliefs.

This year has brought unprecedented Jewish unity on campus through Hillel's endorsement of the Progress Not Politics slate in student government elections and the March 16 rally against global terrorism. Roughly 40 per cent of Jewish students on campus affiliate with Hillel. This year, many more of them took an active role.

For people who disagree with students involved in Hillel, don't just criticize, get involved yourself. Hillel is a student organization and it is the students' responsibility to shape it within a pro-Israel and pluralistic framework. While it is unrealistic for one campus group to cater to all student interests, Hillel does an exemplary job of coming close to this ideal.

Vanunu did great damage

After 18 years in jail for exposing Israel's nuclear secrets, Mordechai Vanunu still does not understand what kind of damage he did to his own country.

If he truly said, "There is no need for a Jewish state," let him spend another 18 years in prison.

Corporal punishment

Many thanks to The CJN for recognizing the importance of the corporal punishment issue. ("Parents should find other ways to discipline children" and "Corporal punishment – a very qualified yes," CJN, March 11).

Many people use the Bible to justify physical discipline, but Rabbi Wayne Allen, who's in favour of limited corporal punishment, clarifies that while teaching children is a high priority, corporal punishment is not a requisite for this mitzvah. That physical correction was common in ancient times is not surprising. What's impressive, according to Rabbi Allen's explanation, is the way official rabbinic teaching from the third to the 13th century developed so progressively on this issue and limited corporal punishment. I think this rabbinic path leads ultimately to Ron Levin's argument against corporal punishment, which reflects our present-day knowledge and sensibilities.

We must recognize that spanking is hitting, and that hitting is assault. Violence is not a tool. It is always destructive, however well-intentioned. Repealing Section 43 of the Criminal Code, which allows corporal punishment, does not mean many parents and teachers will be unfairly incriminated. (visit repeal43.org for information and answers.) We change the world by how we raise our children. We will never rid the world of violence if we don't rid the home, and specifically childhood, of violence.

Israel, one of 11 countries to legislate against corporal punishment, is truly a light unto the nations on this issue. Section 43 can still be repealed by an act of Parliament if people speak up. Let's follow Israel's example, which is inspired by Judaism's vibrant tradition of pursuing justice.

The ball is in Arafat's court

After Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's recent meeting with U.S. President George W. Bush, the Israelis have stepped up to their obligations under the road map peace plan by beginning to get out of Gaza. Now the Palestinians must reciprocate by getting out of terror. They have not done a single thing in this direction since negotiations broke down more than three years ago. Again, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is paying the price for his refusal to negotiate, and the Palestinians will have to work hard to get back any of the lands currently taken up by Israeli settlements in the West Bank. Bush and Sharon agreed that it would be preposterous to force all of the more than 250,000 Israelis in the West Bank to move.

The fact that Israel will not take back the so-called Palestinian refugees who left Israel in the 1940s should also come as no surprise. Such a migration would destroy the very essence of the State of Israel. Those Palestinians can easily be integrated into the countries where they presently live and, if their host nations allow it, become useful and productive citizens. If compensation is to be demanded for those Palestinians refugees, the same must be given to the Jews who were kicked out of Arab countries in and after 1948 and successfully settled in Israel.

The ball is now in Arafat's court. It remains to be seen whether he will once again miss another opportunity for peace and prosperity for the Palestinians.

Israel and the EU

Does Europe reject the "right of return?"

By AMNON RUBINSTEIN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The European reaction to U.S. President George W. Bush's speech at his meeting with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon last month was interesting for what it did not contain: reservations about Bush's explicit comments on Palestinian refugees' non-right of return.

The absence of any such statements is telling in view of the hysterical reaction from Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and from PA spokesperson Saeb Erekat on the issue, and their reiteration of the demand that every refugee must be granted the right to return to Israel, with no restrictions.

The European reservations about Bush's speech related only to the question of borders and the need for agreement between Israel and the Palestinians on this matter, but did not add that there is also need for such agreement on the right of return. Europe's silence is not unintentional. No European body has joined the Palestinian demand on the matter of return, and the European Council has explicitly rejected this demand.

In Europe, there is no right of return to rectify the injustices that were done at the end of the 1940s, and there is no right of return for Germans who were denied their property and their rights when they were expelled with great cruelty from areas of the Czech Republic, Poland and Slovakia, where they had resided for hundreds of years.

On the eve of the Czech Republic's entry into the European Union, rightist circles voiced a demand to rescind the "Benes decrees" – promulgated by Eduard Benes, the president of Czechoslovakia after the war – that expropriated the property of the Sudeten Germans and were adopted afterward by the Czechoslovakian parliament. The rightists also called for the cancellation of the amnesty the decrees granted to those who at the time committed serious crimes against the ethnic German inhabitants. In contrast to the rightists' demand, the European Council determined there is no need to rescind the decrees in order to allow the Czech Republic to join the EU.

During German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder's visit to Prague in September 2003, the two sides declared that even though "the past must not be forgotten, it must not be an obstacle to the future."

Relations between Germany and the Czech Republic are good, and no one talks about the right of return, even though for the Czech Republic, it is not an existential threat and would not lead to the loss of its Czech majority. This is also the case with respect to German-Polish relations.

Not only is there no moral basis for the Palestinian demand – as its aim is to destroy Israel from within – there is also no legal basis for it.

The only explicit United Nations recommendation on the matter of return is the one in General Assembly Resolution 194 from 1948. The resolution is directed at the (defunct) Conciliation Commission that was established at the time and includes other instructions that concern, for example, the internationalization of Jerusalem. The resolution relates to the Palestinian refugees who wish to return to their homes and live in peace with their (Jewish) neighbours and determines that they should be allowed to do so as soon as possible.

But the resolution, even if it once had legal validity, is not relevant today, as it deals with a world that no longer exists. It speaks about refugees themselves, whereas now the Palestinians are demanding a right of return for their descendants, who have been raised on bottomless hatred for Israelis and Jews and are incapable of living in peace with Jews and being loyal citizens of the state.

The resolution was passed before the massive expulsion of Jewish refugees from Arab countries and the expropriation of their property under racist and anti-Semitic laws. For this reason alone, it is devoid of meaning, as today it is necessary to take into account property rights of refugees on both sides.

Therefore, it is very regrettable that the formulators of the Geneva Initiative saw fit to base themselves on a resolution that deserves a dishonourable burial. Although they have limited, using unclear definitions, the proportion of refugees who will be entitled to return to Israel, the very mention of the resolution is a strategic mistake.

Bush, the European Council, and Sari Nusseibeh (in his joint document with Ami Ayalon) did well to define the Palestinians' right of return by restricting it to the Palestinian state and not to the Jewish state, which the "right of return" aims to eliminate.

The EU leaders, in their silence, also support this position.

Europe pushing Palestinian interests

By LESLIE SUSSER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

After what it sees as U.S. President George W. Bush's tilt toward Israel, the European Union is indicating that it wants to play a larger role in resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict – with an eye toward promoting Palestinian interests.

In a series of under-reported statements after Bush's perceived watershed meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on April 14, senior European officials have been hinting at greater European involvement on the ground and a new get-tough policy with Israel.

Addressing the European Parliament in Strasbourg on April 21, Chris Patten, the EU's commissioner for external relations, declared bluntly that the Europeans are ready to help rehabilitate the Gaza Strip after Israel's promised withdrawal next year, on condition that the Israel Defence Forces guarantee "not to destroy again what we build."

Speaking in Tel Aviv the same day, Giancarlo Chevallard, the EU's ambassador to Israel, warned that the European Union intends to link the level of ties with Israel to the Jewish state's "commitment to peacemaking."

Top European officials have also been meeting with their U.S. counterparts to co-ordinate the precise role the EU can play in the Gaza withdrawal. This will be discussed further early next month at a meeting of the "Quartet" – a diplomatic grouping of the United States, European Union, United Nations and Russia that produced the "road map" peace plan.

The EU began its campaign for a more significant role in the Gaza process by sending Javier Solana, its foreign policy point man, to Washington, D.C., for an April 20 meeting with U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell.

Afterward, Solana outlined three principles of EU thinking on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict: Nothing should be done to prejudge the outcome of final status negotiations between Israelis and Palestinians, the Quartet should co-ordinate its policy moves, and the withdrawal from Gaza should be carried out in an "appropriate manner."

All three principles implied criticism of Bush. In the European view, the president prejudged issues of borders and refugees by saying that demographic realities on the ground – that is, Israeli settlements – should be taken into account in setting final borders, and that refugees should return to a future Palestinian state rather than to Israel.

Moreover, in declaring his "new" policy, Bush acted alone, without consulting his European partners, and did nothing to co-ordinate the Gaza withdrawal with the Palestinians.

Powell is taking the European sense of slight seriously. The day after meeting with Solana, he approached Spanish Foreign Minister Miguel Moratinos – who served for seven years as the EU's special envoy to the Middle East – urging him to help with the Gaza plan.

The Europeans would like to play a role in co-ordinating the withdrawal with the Palestinians. They maintain that this is essential if the pullback is to create a new peace dynamic.

Patten made the point in his address to the European Parliament: "Our aim must be that Israelis recognize again the Palestinian Authority as their partner in the peace process. The objective should be to hand over Gaza and parts of the West Bank to the Palestinian Authority – not to Hamas – and to ensure that the handover takes place in an orderly fashion, not in a way that leads to more chaos and violence."

Patten suggests the Europeans, rather than the Americans, could help bring the Palestinians into a positive process with Israel. It's the Europeans, he points out, who more than anyone else have funded Palestinian projects; and it was constructive European influence that helped PA Finance Minister Salam Fayyad achieve transparency and accountability on budget procedures, in line with economic reforms the Quartet demanded of the Palestinian Authority.

What seems to be shaping up is a complex carrot-and-stick policy in which the United States encourages Israel and puts pressure on the Palestinians, while the Europeans do the reverse. Patten made clear that Europe is prepared to continue its humanitarian assistance to the Palestinians and help rebuild their economic infrastructure, but at the same time, he was highly critical of Israel.

"We are certainly prepared to continue our humanitarian assistance and to support the rebuilding of the infrastructure of those areas from which the Israel Defence Forces withdraw," he said in Strasbourg. "But I have to say that this time I think we should seek certain guarantees from the Israel Defence Forces that they will not destroy again what we build."

The Europeans are not making do with mere criticism. They intend to use their economic clout to exert political pressure on Israel. Europe is Israel's largest trading partner, and Israel has a preferential trade deal with EU countries.

It took Israel years to negotiate the agreement, and for years it has been trying to upgrade it. Now, the Europeans say bluntly that they intend to create a linkage between their economic ties with Israel and the way it deals with the Palestinian issue.

At his Tel Aviv news conference April 21, Chevallard said that "up till now, we kept the strengthening of bilateral relations with Israel separate from the regional diplomatic process. From this point on they will be part of one complex."

He did not envision sanctions on Israel, but said the EU would enhance or downgrade ties with Israel depending on its peacemaking performance.

He added that the Europeans expected that Israel would "recognize that the EU has a large role to play in the Middle East" and, in the future, he suggested that Israel consult not only with the United States, as it had on the Gaza plan, but with Europe as well.

Some Israeli analysts believe the Europeans may even suggest an alternative plan to the one Bush and Sharon agreed to at the White House.

It's more likely, however, that they will seek a role within the framework of the Israeli-American plan and will use their support for the Palestinians to make inroads in the Arab world, where the United States is struggling, partly because of its support for Israel and partly because of the situation in Iraq.

Living as a Reform Jew in Israel

I'm often asked how, as a Reform Jew, I manage to live in Israel, even though my brand of Judaism doesn't get the same official recognition as Orthodoxy. When I assure people that I'm doing fine, some people are surprised. Without minimizing the gross disadvantages of Reform and Conservative congregations and institutions, living as a non-Orthodox religious Jew in the Jewish state is no less exhilarating than for any other Jew.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

Most towns in Israel have either a Conservative or a Reform congregation, or both. In the cities, there's usually more than one of each. Though, unlike Orthodox institutions, they get no state support, several have adequate buildings and others are in the process of acquiring them. Local families celebrate their children's bar and bat mitzvahs there and regard the Reform synagogue as their religious home. On a Shabbat morning, I can easily walk to four Reform places of worship in Jerusalem. Two others are a little further away.

Most of the rabbis in Reform (in Israel, Progressive) and Conservative (Masorti) congregations were trained in Israel and many were born there. The Hebrew Union College in Jerusalem has currently dozens of students preparing to serve the Israeli Progressive movement as congregational rabbis and teachers.

The Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism is the umbrella organization for all Reform institutions in the Jewish state. These include kindergartens, primary and high schools. Through its Religious Action Centre, Reform seeks to give expression to its vision of social justice by championing the causes of the disadvantaged.

One of the causes is the struggle for religious pluralism. It demands equal rights to all Jewish religious streams. Many Israelis, secular and religious, see the absence of such equality as a scandal and know that things must change.

For there are "facts on the ground." Even though the state doesn't sanction Progressive and Masorti marriages, every year hundreds of Jewish couples in Israel are married by non-Orthodox rabbis. They either treat the official rabbinate as an administrative office and, after the formalities, turn to the rabbi of their choice for an appropriate ceremony, or they marry civilly in some other country and then come home for a religious wedding.

Similarly, though non-Orthodox rabbis would not be allowed to conduct funerals arranged by official burial societies, many kibbutzim have their own burial grounds. These easily accommodate non-Orthodox ceremonies and officiants.

Of course, I don't ignore the punishing disadvantages under which my movement functions in Israel. But other than in the eyes of the official rabbinate, extremist politicians and overzealous bureaucrats, Reform and Conservative Jews are treated as equals and can express themselves adequately, though not always easily, within the framework of the tradition of their choice.

No offence, but that's bigotry

The clock strikes twelve and the hordes of suits and ties start streaming through the doors of Calgary's downtown offices and out onto the bustling streets.

It's lunchtime and, more importantly, escape time for those looking to get away from the office, share a meal with friends and sit out in the sun while forgetting anything significant or relevant in their lives.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

For a few minutes, I'm also one of those people, making my way toward a favourite lunch spot with a close friend.

She's telling me about her upcoming trip with her family, and how her mother has been trying to get time off from her employer, with considerable difficulty.

"Her bosses are so unreasonable," she sighs with frustration. "They treat her really badly and they're really stingy with things like benefits or decent pay. They're totally greedy.

"No offence, but they're Jewish."

Suddenly the world in front of me stops. The sun dims, my heart sinks, and yet I keep on walking, stunned into silence.

I cannot believe what I have just heard.

More importantly, I cannot believe what I have just heard from the mouth of one of my closest friends.

So much for a relaxing lunch hour.

By making such a statement, she recognizes my Jewish background – why else would she have included the disclaimer of "no offence"? But is she lumping me into the same category? Or does she think that because I'm not greedy and horrible (in fact, I think I'm one of the most generous people you will ever meet), in her mind I'm not really Jewish?

I didn't challenge my friend on what she said. I was completely silent, and the air was heavy with unspoken sentiments afterward. I think perhaps she realized her blunder, but she never apologized or acknowledged it.

After giving it some thought, I didn't think there would be a point in actually confronting her about what she said, for I wouldn't succeed in changing her mind. I would only make her more careful about saying what she really thinks when she is around me. After all, said another close friend in whom I confided my hurt, "I wouldn't look into it too much. It's probably the same thing I would say if I wasn't careful about it."

Disparaging remarks can be made about anyone's religion, race or ethnicity. No one is immune to it, though many people certainly seem to think so.

If not, then why would some people feel so comfortable putting someone else down because of their religion or the geographic area of the world they come from? Why then would someone make broad, sweeping generalizations about an entire nation of people?

How easy it seems to be to grow up believing in something because you have been indoctrinated to such an extent that you no longer possess the power or the ability to question what goes on around you.

These issues continued to swirl in my mind when a former PLO terrorist turned Zionist came to speak at the University of Calgary last week.

Born in Bethlehem in 1960, Walid Shoebat was indoctrinated against Israel as a child and began participating in terror-related activities from a young age.

Now he is a converted Christian making the motivational speech circuit, telling delighted audiences all the things they want to hear.

"In kindergarten, I remember the first song we had was 'Arabs are beloved, and Jews are Dogs.' And we sang this every morning," he told us in the same way an alcoholic might confess his addictions.

The thing is, I believe that there are milder, less apparent forms of indoctrination going on right here in Canada, in contemporary North American society, yet no one really talks about it.

But it happens every night around the dinner table, as young children listen to their parents share insights about neighbours, colleagues, or employers.

"Pass the salt" is thus uttered in the same vein, and with the same carefree casualness, as "that Chink family who lives next door" or "greedy, money-grubbing Jews."

Or perhaps, even "No offence… but they're Jewish."

Looking to philosophy for answers

When I mention to people that my undergraduate arts major is philosophy, the instant and automatic response is always, "What are you going to do with that?" While I don't aspire to be a philosopher, I am quick to defend my choice of major. Aside from the fact that few arts degrees render you job-ready, I think there is something very valuable to be gained from studying philosophy.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

As I write this column, I am in the middle of writing my last paper of the academic year. I wish that it would come to me as easily as this column does, but, unfortunately, that is not the case. The thing about philosophy is that it sucks you in – it's not just about analysis, it's about taking the words of others, finding the meaning in them, and then making sense of them for yourself.

My final paper will be the product of a semester's reading in Jewish philosophy, which, because the University of King's College has no set courses on the subject, I did independently. For four months, I laboured through some texts and discussed my questions and thoughts with a professor of mine.

Without the luxury of a class full of people to offer their own thoughts and analysis, I have been on my own to make sense of the texts, many of which are more than a century old. But as is the case with philosophy in general, studying Jewish philosophy is not just about grasping the words of a text, it's about making the ideas your own.

I have been reading Star of Redemption by Franz Rosenzweig (1886-1929), an assimilated German Jewish intellectual who was on the brink of converting to Christianity when he was captivated by Kol Nidre services in Berlin and returned to Judaism. His philosophy is as an attempt to bridge philosophic and religious thought through man, the individual thinker in the world. Rosenzweig offers a way to understand our relationships on earth as reflective of our relationship to God.

For many people, the word philosophy undoubtedly connotes "esoteric" and "abstract," but anyone who can read stands to gain something from the philosophic texts written by modern Jewish thinkers. For on the most basic level, they sought to answer, albeit formally, many of the questions that we ourselves consider at some point in our lives.

Rarely do we think of philosophy as the vehicle to bring us to a better understanding of faith – we don't hear or speak about philosophy in synagogue, and even in day schools, there is little room for philosophy, given the demands of Jewish history, Tanach, literature and Talmud. But in a secular world, it can be seen as the voice of those who have stood where we stand, in between two juxtaposed worlds, one of religious practice and another of secular experience. In it, we stand to find accessible ideas that we can tangibly grasp.

Perhaps it is a reflection of our instrumentalist society, but four years of education is often seen as a means to get into law school rather than an opportunity to consider ideas that can lead to personal change. And so my rant in defence of philosophy is exposed. History and political science allow us to understand, in practical terms, what has happened and is happening in the world. Literature offers an escape from reality, or perhaps a depiction of it. Philosophy provides a means to accomplish both tasks.

Philosophy offers a journey into minds shaped by other ages, but it does so in such a way as to leave room for us to make our own formulations about what we learn from the thoughts of others. Reading Rosenzweig is about exploring a new dimension of Judaism, about considering the relation between secular and religious life in new terms.

Religion can often appear dogmatic because it is built on the assumption of belief. Philosophy, in contrast, seeks to explain or even justify belief in more rational terms.

I am the first to admit that I am a philosophy geek, and the 30 pages on Rosenzweig that I have yet to write will undoubtedly reinforce that status. Nevertheless, I hold fast to my argument that philosophy shouldn't be relegated to the corners of academia, for within the pages of our own modern Jewish philosophers, we can find many answers, or at least avenues of response, to questions we have all faced at one time or another.

The Kirshner File

Films at festival range far and wide

The topics of the movies at this year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which ends on May 9, ranged far and wide.

Charles Guggenheim's Berga: Soldiers of Another War addresses a little-known subject: the treatment of captured U.S. Jewish soldiers by Nazi Germany. During the 1944 Battle of the Bulge, Germany's last-ditch effort to turn the tide of the war, thousands of American troops fell into captivity and were taken to the gruesome Stalag 9B prisoner-of-war-camp near Frankfurt. The Germans asked for a list of the Jewish soldiers, but the officer in charge of the POWs, an ethnic American German named Hans Kasten, refused to comply with their demand. After 80 soldiers declared themselves Jewish, the German commandant picked out an additional 270 individuals he suspected of being Jewish. Segregated and placed in separate barracks, they were then shipped off to a slave labour camp at Berga Elster, where conditions were incredibly harsh and where even sick POWs were compelled to work. With defeat looming, the Germans evacuated the camp. When the famished prisoners were finally rescued by U.S. forces, they were teetering on the edge of death. "We were a ragged group of animals," one man recalls. "We all looked like skin and bones," another veteran says. Berga, an excellent documentary, pays tribute to their resilience and sheds light on a heretofore largely unexamined aspect of the war.

Emma Goldman: An Exceedingly Dangerous Woman is a superb biopic. Mel Bucklin's empathetic film traces the arc of her career as an American anarchist and flamboyant crusader for free speech, free love, women's rights, birth control and unionization. Born in Russia, Goldman immigrated to the United States in 1885 when she was 16 after a failed arranged marriage. By 24, she was regarded as a dangerous agitator by the authorities. Goldman, a dynamic speaker, could bring an audience to a frenzy. Her fervent opposition to America's participation in World War I earned her the scorn of the government. In 1919, she was deported to Russia, but left two years later, disillusioned with the dictatorial policies of the new Bolshevik order. She spent her last months in Canada, dying in 1940. Though half-forgotten today, Goldman was certainly a trailblazer, as this multi-layered movie demonstrates.

The Wall, by Benny Brunner, is a critical examination of the security fence Israel is currently building through the West Bank and around Jerusalem. Brunner, an Israeli, believes it has had a devastating impact on the Palestinians and is embittering a new Palestinian generation. A Palestinian woman complains that her land has been expropriated and that her fruit trees have been uprooted. A Palestinian taxi driver likens the barrier to the dreaded Berlin Wall. Israeli peace activist Haim Hanegbi says it cuts off Palestinians from each other, while Ha'aretz reporter Amira Hass contends it is part and parcel of Israel's "expansionist ideology." The sole neutral voice in this partisan film is that of the Israeli in charge of its construction.

Inspiring Figure: The Louis Rubenstein Story turns on Canada's legendary figure skating champion. The son of Polish immigrants who settled in Montreal in the 1850s, he took up skating as a child. During the 1880s, he won several North American titles, and in 1890, he earned a gold medal at the European championship in Russia. Retiring at 28, he turned to politics as a Montreal alderman. A dashing figure who excelled in several sports, he was president of the Montreal Amateur Athletics Association and the YMHA. Olympic gold medalist Barbara Ann Scott describes him as the father of Canadian figure skating. Richard Pound, an International Olympic Committee official, says he exemplified the spirit of true sportsmanship and community service. Rosalind Raddatz's film, while short, is illuminating.

Montreal Jewish Memories: Stories of the War Years 1939-1945, directed by Dov Okouneff, resurrects a bygone era. Fay Ain remembers her job in a garment factory. Harry Meyerovitch talks of his days as a radical on the political scene. Irving Layton summons up images of the first days of the war. Muriel Davis and Joseph Mendelson explain why they joined the army. Edward Wolkove shares reminiscences of his duties as a military instructor. Sidney Shmuelson and William Novick look back at their respective roles as a squadron leader and bomber pilot in the air force. The film oozes with nostalgia, but is rather sketchy.

Captured U.S. soldiers

Isaac Bashevis Singer "...About A Hidden God..." is an affectionate tribute to a master of Yiddish literature and a Nobel Prize laureate. Isy Morgensztern's pungent film is bolstered by file footage of pre-war Poland and excerpts from Singer's novels and stories. It reflects on his philosophy of life (he was a skeptic and a believer), his fixation with women (sex is to literature what aspirin is to medicine, he claims) and his somewhat distant relationship with Israel (his brief encounter with an arrogant Menachem Begin, Israel's former prime minister, is somewhat testy).

Looking for Victoria: An Argentine Story takes us back to the mid-1970s and early 1980s, when Argentina was governed by a vicious right-wing junta that brooked no dissent and ruthlessly murdered upwards of 30,000 political opponents. These dissidents, including Adriana Victoria Lewi's parents, simply disappeared, never to be heard from again. Ton Vriens' film, which is moving at times, focuses on this dark period and on Adriana's efforts to find out what happened to her Jewish father and Catholic mother. In all probability, they were thrown out of an airplane while still alive. Adriana, now a mother, meets her parents' old friends and talks with a person who saw her father on the eve of his grisly death. Although Adriana cracks the mystery of her parents' disappearance, she mourns for them, ineffably sad that she will never enjoy the simple pleasure of talking with them.

Hiding and Seeking: Faith and Tolerance after the Holocaust is an unusual film, a rumination on the nature of Jewish Orthodoxy and a quest for redemption. Menachem Daum, the co-director, was born in a displaced persons camp in southern Germany and raised in Brooklyn, the son of Holocaust survivors from Poland. An enlightened Orthodox Jew, he believes that his two adult sons, Tzvi Dovid and Akiva, both yeshiva students living in Israel, are closed to the outside world and much too rigid in their views. In an attempt to convince them that all men and women are brothers and sisters, regardless of their religion and ethnicity, he travels with them to Poland. During the Holocaust, a Polish family risked everything to hide their maternal grandfather and his two brothers. When Daum's skeptical sons learn that this Catholic family saved them out of the goodness of their hearts rather than for profit, they are forced to come to terms with their assumption that all gentiles, and particularly Poles, are beyond the pale. This is a deeply personal, touching movie whose lessons are universal.

The Last Witness, by Michael Nekanda-Trepka, revolves around Samuel Willenberg, a Polish Jew. He was one of the precious few inmates who succeeded in escaping from the Treblinka concentration camp. Now, decades later, as an Israeli, he goes back to Poland to retrace his steps. When Willenberg, an intense man, arrives in Treblinka, he is overcome by emotions. In a series of graphic flashbacks, and with a distinctive catch in his voice, he recalls the terrifying sights and the unforgettable odours of that death camp, as well as his miraculous escape from that pit of hell.

Mendel, a Norwegian film set in the mid-1950s, is about an impressionable Jewish boy trying to adapt to a new home in Norway after his family leaves Germany. Mendel, the central character, is eager to assimilate into a society where Jews are both revered and reviled. But his parents, Holocaust survivors who keep secrets from him but not his older, wiser brother, discourage his efforts. This is a modest but inventive coming-of-age movie.

Berlin Bershert is a funny, offbeat confection from Germany. Two attractive sisters, Dahlia and Leah, are in the market for mates. Dahlia, a journalist and an atheist, could not care less whether her boyfriend is Jewish. In fact, she is not looking for a nice Jewish boy. Leah, a Hebrew teacher who keeps kosher, is a lesbian. November Wanderin's satirical film is composed of biting vignettes in which Dahlia and Leah meet their respective dates. Dahlia rejects a nerdy American journalist writing stories on Jews in Germany, while Leah dumps a woman of vaguely Jewish origin who dislikes Israel and is clearly pro-Palestinian. Just when you think their quest for companionship is hopeless, Mr. Right and Miss Congeniality suddenly appear. Berlin Bershert is proof that Jewish life in Germany is returning to a semblance of normality.

Abjad (The First Letter), a film from Iran, deals with the budding but doomed romance between a Muslim and a Jewish teenager. Director Abolfazl Jalili treats the Jewish content only indirectly and by inference. The pace is plodding, but the performances ring true.

Charter flights to Israel set to begin in June

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A Toronto tour operator is offering discounted charter flights to Israel beginning June 22.

Sabra Tours has contracted with Skyservice, a Canadian-based charter airline with 24 aircraft, to fly every Tuesday from Toronto to Tel Aviv with a stop in Ireland. The flights, using a 240-seat Boeing 757, will be priced beginning at $1,099, substantially less than full-service airlines El Al and Air Canada.

Should the flight prove popular, Sabra has the option of adding a second summer flight, said Diana Shenker Rozental, the travel agency's vice-president.

The addition of a new flight to Israel, coupled with El Al's recent announcement of eight weekly flights this summer and Air Canada's seven, suggests that travellers are returning to Israel in growing numbers. Tourism to Israel had been hit hard by the three-year old Palestinian uprising.

Shenker Rozental said the Sabra-booked flights will run until Oct. 6.

So far, "it's selling, thank God."

Shenker Rozental suggested the market for travel to Israel is large enough – and varied enough – to accommodate all the players. She expected there would be little overlap with El Al or Air Canada passengers. Her clients, she said, would be individuals who fly to Israel using lower-cost options that generally included a European stopover. Airline such as Lufthansa, KLM, British Airways, Alitalia, Malev and Air France all offer flights to Israel, but with layovers in Europe. These flights are less expensive than the non-stop route flown by Air Canada and El Al. "Ninety per cent of our passengers will come from other airlines.

"Really, we don't take [away] El Al's passengers."

She acknowledged, however, that has El Al dropped its price on its Tuesday flights, though not to the levels offered by Sabra.

"They look at us like competitors, but in my experience, it's a mistake. A charter can't be a competitor for regularly scheduled flights."

Stanley Morais, general manager of El Al's Canadian office, said the airline did offer a limited number of discounted seats on Tuesdays in July, but those have sold out. He also downplayed the competition offered by Sabra, saying El Al's non-stop flights on wider body Boeing 767s, as well as the airline's vaunted security measures, the convenience and flexibility offered by a full-service airline, should help El Al retain its passengers.

Morais and Shenker Rozental agreed that Israel is experiencing a surge in tourism. El Al, he said, is expecting double the number of bookings it had last summer and could bring as many as 1,500 passengers to Tel Aviv in July alone.

From 2000 to 2003 were very hard years in Israel, Shenker Rozental said, "but today it's not so big a problem to be in Israel and passengers don't take a lot of risk… I think there will be a lot of tourism in Israel."

Shenker Rozental said that despite its entry into the Israel-bound charter market, Sabra will continue to sell tickets on El Al. She said the Israeli airline is more suitable for passengers whose schedules don't coincide with the set flights operated by the charter.

* * *

In other developments, El Al has asked the United States to permit its aircraft to employ a new "FlightGuard" anti-missile system. The system, to be tested in June, will be employed on all the airline's aircraft and will be installed on six planes by the end of 2004.

The United States, sensitive to the concerns of environmental groups, normally doesn't allow planes equipped with foreign defence systems to land at its airports, Ha'aretz reported.

Morais said the development shows the concern of the Israeli government and El Al in assuring the safety of passengers.

In November 2002, an Arkia flight leaving Mombasa, Kenya was shot at by a pair of shoulder-mounted missiles, which missed. It was widely reported the Israeli aircraft was probably equipped with a missile defence system.

Morais said he doesn't believe the terrorism scare that led Canadian authorities to divert an El Al flight from Toronto to Hamilton last October had any affect on El Al's decision to upgrade its defence systems.

He said that if implemented, the missile system, along with the use of CTX x-ray machines for all baggage and other measures, make El Al "the leader when it comes to all means of security when it comes to commercial aviation."

PROUD OF ISRAEL: The students and staff at the Leo Baeck Day School commemorated Yom Hazikaron by retelling the stories of our past, and celebrated Yom Ha'atzmaut with song and dance. These Grade 1 children wave their flags with pride and enthusiasm for Israel.

Tread on me, German 'stumbling stones' implore

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Kurt Herzstein wants people to walk on his mother's name.

"It will be a great honour," says the German-born Toronto resident and Holocaust survivor. "I feel very good about it. It means more to me than having her name inscribed at Yad Vashem, where there are millions of others. Here, it's just one name – hers."

On May 17, a stone inscribed with the following will be hammered into the sidewalk in front of #35 Lahnstrasse in the German city of Duisburg, north of Dusseldorf: "Here lived Hertha Herzstein, born 1896, deported to Westerbork, murdered July 19, 1943 in KZ Sobibor." Thirteen stones bearing the names of the other residents of the apartment building who were killed by the Nazis will accompany it in the ground.

The 10x10 centimeter concrete stones, their information inscribed on a brass plate facing up, are called Stolpersteine, literally, stumbling stones or obstacles. In this case, they are not meant to trip over in the literal sense, but rather in the emotional sense. While they are level with the ground, their intent is to get pedestrians to stop and consider the name on the stone.

"That stone represents a person. Can you imagine thousands and thousands of them?" asks Herzstein, 80, who escaped his birthplace of Duisburg at 14 and fled to Holland, Cuba and finally, Canada.

A German artist has done more than imagine. Gunter Demnig, a 56-year-old sculptor from Cologne, plans to pound as many of the Stolpersteine into European soil as he can – and into the hearts and minds of its residents. Demnig researches Jewish victims of the Holocaust, including their birthplace and places of incarceration and death. (Ironically, he relies on deportation lists compiled by the Gestapo, which are said be very thorough.) He then etches the information onto a shiny brass plaque affixed to the block, which is fit into the sidewalk or road at the entrance to the victim's last place of residence.

To date, Demnig has installed more than 3,500 of the commemorative stones across Germany, generating much media attention, and is planning expansion into France, Poland, Austria, Hungary, the Netherlands and Italy. Each stone costs 95 Euros (about $150) and can be "adopted" by groups or individuals, or purchased by relatives of victims as memorials. Reports say Demnig can barely keep up with demand from schools and individuals all over Germany.

As far as he knows, Herzstein is the sole Canadian to have a loved one thus immortalized. And immortal he feels it is.

"Anyone who walks over these stones is keeping the [victim's] memory alive because their shoes scuff the metal to a shine. They can last forever and almost everyone stops to look," he says.

The innovative project began in the early 1990s, when Demnig paid artistic tribute to Gypsy victims of the Holocaust in Cologne. In 1995, he laid his first stones for Jewish victims in the same city, where the markers now total some 1,300.

Today, there are nearly 700 stones in Hamburg and the municipal government in Berlin has approved 2,000 of them. New inquiries come in all the time.

But not everyone is onside. The city of Leipzig turned the project down, saying the stones are "reminiscent of Hollywood Boulevard in Los Angeles." And both the mayor of Munich and head of the city's Jewish community are opposed to the markers, fearing they would be trampled on by neo-Nazis.

Herzstein says surprisingly few of the stones have been vandalized to date, and none destroyed. However, some Germans have tried to prevent installations in front of their homes.

Herzstein won't attend the installation of the stone bearing his mother's name. He's content to know that the markers of the residents of his former home is a project of a Grade 10 class at the local high school.

"They are German Catholics and the kids learn both ancient and modern Hebrew taught by a pastor," Herzstein says. "They wouldn't take any money from me.

"I leave it in their hands."

Finance for Thought

Leveling the Investment Playing Field

S. Jonathan Kirshblum,
B.A., CFP, FMA, FCSI
Financial Planner
Investment Advisor

"If I wrote you a cheque today for 50 million dollars, how would you go about investing it?" This was the opening question asked on the final day of the financial conference to which I referred in last week's article. It was a powerful question. In this room sat an assortment of investment advisors, many of whom were seasoned stockbrokers, and yet in answering the question no one spoke of hiring a stockbroker or investing in mutual funds.

High net worth individuals commonly use a simple formula for managing their investments. With the help of a financial planner, they identify financial objectives and then hire private money managers to direct daily investment decisions in line with their stated goals. These managers regularly command minimum account sizes that can range from 1 to 100 million dollars. Some are recognized as specialists in specific sectors of the markets; often, a wide variety of managers are assembled to build an optimally diversified portfolio with corresponding decreased levels of risk. Many of these private money managers are unknown to the general public because unlike mutual funds, they seldom advertise.

The exciting news for those of us who have not yet amassed 50 million dollars is that we can now access the services and professional expertise these money managers provide, through investment vehicles known as "managed" accounts. Managed accounts are portfolios that offer us packaged sets of services similar to those used by pension funds and high net worth individuals. There are now many different managed accounts available through the major investment firms in Canada. While the bells and whistles may vary from one to another, they tend to have certain common features.

Access Many of the world's private institutional money managers can now be accessed through managed programs. Utilizing the expertise of managers recognized as specialists in specific investment strategies can offer great portfolio diversification. Combining the efforts of many of these managers in one program also helps to reduce overall portfolio risk.

Impartial Consulting Some programs integrate the service of a third party consulting firm that specializes in profiling private money managers worldwide. The consulting firm often plays a central role in selection and co-ordination of managers and ongoing monitoring of performance. Some consulting firms continually monitor all trading activity of managers selected for the program to ensure each manager strictly adheres to his or her designated mandate.

Automatic Rebalancing While great care should be taken in establishing an investor's appropriate asset allocation, price shifts in underlying assets often move an investor's portfolio away from the original mandate. Some managed programs offset this risk by continually rebalancing the portfolio; this exercise may apply to something as small as an individual stock holding, or to something as large as an entire geographic allocation. Rebalancing ensures a portfolio is regularly brought back in line with the investor's targeted asset allocation and desired level of risk.

Improved Reporting Many managed programs provide detailed, clear reporting. For example, many managed account statements show clear comparisons between manager performance and established benchmarks. This provides investors and advisors an effective method for interpreting performance results.

Deductible All-inclusive Fee The fee structure of most managed programs is calculated as a percentage of assets under management. In many cases the fee is all-inclusive and covers the services of all the professionals involved: the firm offering the program, the firm's managed advisory group, the investment advisor, the consulting firm and the money managers. Unlike commissions on stock trading or mutual fund management fees, managed account fees for non-registered assets are typically almost fully tax-deductible.

Finally, one important consequence of managed accounts has been the recognition by many investment advisors that it is counter-productive to continue spending their days staring at trading monitors or reading analysts' reports. Many advisors have decided to leave the market study to money managers and instead have begun honing their level of expertise in other areas of financial consulting.

This is a tremendously positive development for the individual who seeks a holistic solution to investing. An investor can now organize his or her complete financial plan and enjoy investment services previously reserved for the wealthy, by working with one advisor who is both skilled in financial planning and who uses a "managed" approach to portfolio management. For all investors, this combination of financial services should provide enhanced performance, decreased levels of risk and the most important return, that of peace of mind.

Jewish Life

Journey to a 19th-century shtetl

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Back about 150 years ago, the town of Kamenets was a typical Russian-Polish shtetl consisting of "250 old houses, black and small with shingled roofs," and with some 450 Jews listed in the Revizski Skazki, the official government registry.

However, most of the town's Jews did not appear in the registry. Fearful that their sons would be drafted into the army, many simply left town briefly rather than register with the authorities. Each year, the community leader would pay a steep bribe to a visiting government inspector before the latter, accompanied by the entire town gendarmery, would make his rounds.

"On inspection day, many houses were locked up, their tenants fled, and scarcely a living soul was seen in the streets," Yekhezkel Kotik would recall. "The place resembled a ghost town – a cemetery… [But] like every prior year, the inspector left Kamenets after signing the protocol that everything was in perfect order."

This telling vignette appears in Kotik's 1913 Yiddish-language memoir, recently published in English as Journey to a Nineteenth-Century Shtetl: The Memoirs of Yekhezkel Kotik (Wayne State University Press).

The author's colourful reminiscences include a description of the short-lived "panic of 1842," when a widespread rumour suggested the government would soon prohibit Jews from marrying before the age of 20. "Whoever had an eight-year-old son or daughter wasted no time in marrying him or her off," Kotik writes. "In order to keep the police in the dark, the marriages took place in utter secrecy and without lavish ceremony."

Kotik, who began writing his memoirs in his mid-60s, demonstrates a thorough, preternatural knowledge of events that transpired before his birth, many involving his prominent grandparents and great-grandparents. He describes the shtetl's rich religious and social life as well as the bitter divisions between the Chassidim and their philosophical opponents, the Mitnagdim, which seriously affected relations between himself and his father.

Because his influential grandfather consorted with many lords, Kotik devotes much attention to the complex relations between the Polish nobility, the Jews who often worked for them and the peasant underclass. He also recounts the liberation of the serfs and the Polish rebellion of 1863, upheavals that altered the region's feudal character and brought it into the modern age.

As editor David Attaf notes, it was modernity – not the catastrophe of war – that brought the old-fashioned, intimate world that Kotik paints to an end.

"By 1912, the rapid pace of modernization and the inroads made by emigration, urbanization, industrialization, and secularization made it self-evident to many that the old shtetl was disappearing," Attaf observes in a wonderful introductory essay. The text is also graced by his scholarly editorial notes.

No less a literary critic than Sholom Aleichem called Kotik's memoir "a treasure, a garden" and "a paradise full of blossoming flowers and singing birds." Thanks to this new translation, these delights are now accessible to English readers as well.

Yale Reisner, founder of the Ronald S. Lauder Foundation Genealogy Project in Warsaw, is speaking on "Raising Atlantis: Restoring Jewish Memory in Poland" this month in five cities across North America, including Toronto.

According to legend, Atlantis was an advanced civilization that vanished in a catastrophic flood. For centuries, Poland's Jews constituted the world's largest Jewish community – another influential civilization that was swept away in the cataclysm of the Holocaust.

Reisner has helped scores of people, including many "hidden children," discover their Jewish roots. His talk, which is presented by the Jewish Genealogical Society of Canada (Toronto) and the Polish Jewish Heritage Foundation, will focus on some of the ways Jewish memory is being restored in Poland today.

Jews in the golden ages

Unsettled: An Anthropology of the Jews*, by Melvin Konner, Penguin Books, $45.00.

Why is this sweeping survey of Jewish history and culture different from many similar accounts? Perhaps because the author, a professor of anthropology, brings to his task unusual knowledge as well as the emotions of a thoughtful Jew who has struggled through the trials of religious faith. In addition, he has a gift for vivid storytelling and unfurls a multi-hued canvas of the major events, outstanding personalities and enduring contributions of Judaism and the Jewish people.

Konner describes four great golden ages for Diaspora Jews in empires where the tolerance of the dominant cultures created not just a safe haven but an embrace of friendly alliance and even an honoured place. The first was Babylonia, now Iraq, where the main version of the Talmud was created during the first millennium.

In the second, Muslim Spain, Jews reached the highest ranks of science, scholarship, poetry, statesmanship and military prowess for centuries, slowly spreading the great achievements of Islamic civilization into backward Europe.

The third golden age was established with Amsterdam as its centre, also a consequence of the great Spanish expulsion. Here, the ancient Jewish flair for trade and finance reached even greater heights, and the vigorous Dutch exploration of the world had important Jewish participants and backers. But the fourth and most radiant of all golden ages is the one in the United States of America.

"Women of Valour" is a chapter devoted to women in Jewish history from Dona Gracia and Hannah Senesh to Betty Friedan and Justice Ruth Bader Ginsberg of the United States Supreme Court. Konner agrees with author Cynthia Ozick that the loss of Jewish talent caused by the exclusion of women was "numerically greater than a hundred pogroms" and "culturally and intellectually more debilitating than a century of autos-da-fe."

He relates the sad story of Beruryah, wife of the Talmudic sage Rabbi Meir, renowned for her wisdom and scholarship. Her reputation was sullied by none other then Rashi, the great medieval French commentator, who recounted the gossip that Rabbi Meir had engaged one of his students to seduce his wife, perhaps to test her fidelity. She supposedly succumbed and hanged herself.

This story, says Konner, "was transparently concocted by weak, defensive men to discredit the one brilliant woman in the Talmud, and her husband, for letting her study. It is no longer accepted, but it was used for centuries by fanatical traditionalists to keep women from learning."

Reflecting on his youthful loss of religious faith, Konner asserts that "America and Israel both are more religious today than they have been at any time in generations, and fundamentalist movements are alive and well in Judaism, Christianity and of course Islam. Science, philosophy, psychiatry, prosperity, longevity, capitalism, communism – all were predicted at one time or another to bring the religious impulse, or at least religious forms, to an end. None of them has."

Konner is convinced that with or without a major resurgence of worldwide anti-Semitism, Jewish life will remain strong. This is because Jews are restless, critical, imaginative, resourceful, ambitious, troubled by injustice and committed to self-defence.

"They have been an irritant, an itch on the skin of the planet, for 3,000 years. They keep saying annoying things like 'God is One' and 'Thou shalt not kill,' 'Give me your tired, your poor' and 'Workers of all lands unite,' 'Where there is Id, let Ego be' and '$E=mc^2$,' 'God Bless America' and 'That place, Mr. President, is not your place,' 'If you will it, it is no dream' and 'Never again.'"

Can an American-Jewish community numbering two million or fewer hold its own in a country with 400 million people, including 50 million Hispanic Americans, 30 million African Americans, a vast new Asian American ethnic group and far more Muslims than Jews? No one knows. But it seems likely that the American-Jewish community in the year 2100 will be very small and probably wealthy. How Jewish or secure it will be remains a question.

By turns moving, disturbing, compelling and eloquent, this accessible, creative portrayal of the Jewish people's long and unparalleled history should not be missed.

Jewish Life

Of Google and Joogle Bombs

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

It had all the elements of a classic Internet controversy: anti-Semitism, secret technology and a debate over censorship versus freedom of speech.

Even the most casual user of the Web has come across Google, the popular Internet search engine. And anyone who has ever built a website knows about Google's power and that getting a high ranking in Google can have a huge impact on traffic directed toward your site. Currently, Google is responsible for just over half of all searches done on the Web. (Google also provides AOL with its search engine results. The only other major player is Yahoo [http://searchenginewatch.com/reports/article.php/2156431].)

Google has developed secret algorithms, or mathematical formulas, to help decide its rankings, or how high a particular site would be listed in its search results. For example, if you type the word "Israel" into Google, you get 7.8 million referrals (the top three being the Jerusalem Post, Ha'aretz and Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs) [http://tinyurl.com/2857f]. Obviously, any site wants to be the No. 1 ranked site, and not No. 7.8 million.

If you typed the word "Jew" into Google recently, clicking on the No. 1 link would take you to JewWatch, an anti-Semitic website. Other high-ranking sites included Christian missionary groups. This incensed many people, including Steven Weinstock, who created the Remove JewWatch website and started a petition urging Google to rectify the situation [www.removejewwatch.com/].

Google responded to the controversy with this explanation: "If you recently used Google to search for the word 'Jew,' you may have seen results that were very disturbing. We assure you that the views expressed by the sites in your results are not in any way endorsed by Google... Some people concerned about this issue have created online petitions to encourage us to remove particular links or otherwise adjust search results. Because of our objective and automated ranking system, Google cannot be influenced by these petitions. The only sites we omit are those we are legally compelled to remove or those maliciously attempting to manipulate our results. We apologize for the upsetting nature of the experience you had using Google and appreciate your taking the time to inform us about it" [www.google.com/explanation.html]. Now, whenever anyone searches for "Jew" on Google, the top on the results page leads you to that disclaimer.

The Anti Defamation League praised Google for its quick response. "Google has shown great responsiveness to this issue and a willingness to consider changes to better identify extremist websites, so that users can still have the benefit of Google's unique search technology while being alerted when they are about to enter into a hate zone" [www.adl.org/PresRele/Internet_75/4482_75.htm].

But despite the explanation, JewWatch was still placing high in the rankings. Enter Daniel Sieradski of the Jewschool website. Sieradski is one of many people who believes the Internet is a marketplace for diverse points of view, no matter how objectionable. He also maintains that a solution can be found without resorting to censorship. In this case, Sieradski felt a "Google Bomb" was in order.

I mentioned earlier that Google uses secret algorithms to help it decide its rankings. It seems that part of the secret to ranking high with Google lies in how many other websites link to your page. People have tried, with some success, to influence their ranking by encouraging other sites to link to theirs. That technique is known as a "Google Bomb" [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/google bomb]. (To see a Google Bomb in action, type the phrase "miserable failure" into Google and see what site comes up first [www.google.com/search?q=miserable+failure].)

Sieradski organized what would later become known as a "Joogle Bomb" in order to raise the ranking of a reputable site to the top of Google's rankings for "Jew" [http://tinyurl.com/3eh9m]. He spread the word to as many people as possible to link to the entry for "Jew" to the website for Wikipedia, an online encyclopedia. Sieradski called its entry on "Jew" the "most inclusive, non-denominational, and democratic source on the subject" [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Jew].

It worked. Website creators responded to Sieradski's appeal. Within days – and without resorting to censorship – JewWatch was pushed off its perch atop the Google results for "Jew" and replaced by Wikipedia.

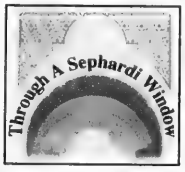
Celebrating Lag la'Omer

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

The 33rd day of the Omer is, according to tradition, the date when the manna began to appear to our forefathers in the desert. The provisions of food they had taken with them from Egypt lasted for all of 30 days. Upon seeing their dwindling rations end before their eyes, they cried in bitter complaint at their predicament. Three days later, on the 18th of Iyar (what Sephardim call Lag la'Omer and Ashkenazim call Lag ba'Omer), the manna descended as a response to their prayers and it continued for the duration of their 40-year trek to the land of Israel.



The 18th of Iyar is also marked in our calendar for another reason. Sephardim observe this date as the anniversary of the passing of the second-century rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai. Rabbi Bar Yochai was a larger than life figure of the Mishnaic era. Wondrous stories abound about his life, his faith and philosophies, and about his defiance of the Roman regime that ruled much of the world during his time. His greatest legacy was arguably his compilation of the multi-volumed Zohar, the oral tradition of Kabbalah, Jewish mysticism and meditation, that had been passed from generation to generation to a select and secretive few.

Rabbi Bar Yochai saw fit to preserve this transmission by committing it to writing, although these writings themselves continued to remain in the hands of a select few for many centuries to come. The study of Torah is, of course, of utmost importance to Jews, but to Sephardim, the study of this part of the Torah is particularly dear. Hence, this date was acclaimed as a date of celebration honouring not only the life of the venerable Rabbi Bar Yochai but of our affinity to the words of the holy Kabbalah.

The occasion is called the "Hilula," a lavish feast celebrated by immediate and extended family members, in which candles are lit, sumptuous foods served, piyuttim (folk songs) sung and legends shared.

With the advent of the State of Israel 56 years ago, the 18th of Iyar has taken on gigantic proportions. Tens of thousands of pilgrims pitch camp in the Galil, the surrounding hills of Meron, the burial site of Rabbi Bar Yochai. Bonfires turn night into day, different bands compete with each other and the smells of spices and roasted meats waft through the night air. People wander from campsite to campsite offering and receiving delicacies and toasts.

It is remarkable that the words of one person who lived 2,000 years ago – words that are virtually undecipherable to all but a very few – are nevertheless revered and celebrated.

Reform Jews increasingly refer to Halachah: rabbi

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Whether or not a same-sex couple actually undergoes a wedding or commitment ceremony, a same-sex union "creates a household…a family in all respects" in the eyes of Reform rabbis, says a leading scholar in the Reform movement.

Rabbi Mark Washofsky, a professor of rabbinics at Hebrew Union College (HUC) – Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati, noted in a recent interview in Toronto that the same would not be true of an unmarried heterosexual couple living together "precisely because we do provide something for a couple like this if they want to say that their union is permanent."

In the Reform movement, some rabbis officiate at same-sex ceremonies and others don't; of those who do, only some consider it a marriage. In the Toronto area, two Reform rabbis Rabbi Michael Dolgin of Temple Sinai Congregation, and Rabbi Lawrence Englander of Mississauga's Solel Congregation – announced earlier this year that they would be officiating at same-sex marriages. Some rabbis in the area have already been officiating quietly at such ceremonies for about two years.

In a recent interview at Temple Sinai, Rabbi Washofsky discussed a range of issues including same-sex marriage, probably the most prominent issue but not the one he considers most pressing. The 51-year-old rabbi, who was ordained at HUC in 1980 and received his doctorate there in 1987, was at the temple for a weekend as scholar-in-residence, speaking on topics including "The Evolution of Reform Jewish Practice" and "The Talmud, Halachah and Reform Judaism."

Rabbi Mark Washofsky

The path back to traditions like kippot in synagogue, more Hebrew in services, and kashrut or aspects of it, in the most liberal of the mainstream denominations, dates back to the 1960s, when Americans were beginning to rediscover their ethnicities, said Rabbi Washofsky.

"Things that previous generations of Reform Jews would have been astonished to see are now serious, live options for Reform Jews," he said. "I think there's a more serious effort by Reform Jews today to explain what we need to do by reference to the Jewish tradition, which is essentially halachic tradition."

Rabbi Washofsky would argue that Halachah – Jewish law – has always played a role in Reform Judaism. "In the 19th century Reform Jews tried to introduce reforms in Jewish ritual life, and tended to justify them by arguing over Jewish legal sources."

Even at its most radical, he said, Reform Judaism kept an attachment to certain forms of Jewish behaviour. "We were still doing Halachah, but we didn't want to admit it."

The biggest issue for the Reform movement, Rabbi Washofsky believes, is Jewish continuity – a buzzword first heard in the 1990s in the general Jewish community. Earlier generations of Jews were "different by default," the rabbi said.

In his own case, for example, the New Orleans native, whose parents and two grandmothers were American-born, said that Yiddish was not spoken in his home. "That sort of ethnicity was not there. I don't have it to pass on to the next generation.

"Nowadays our Jewish identity has to come from our own decision to be Jewish, rather than from a fact of life. We have to decide that we're going to take time off on Friday night and Saturday, that we're going to pray in a different way… We have to see that being Jewish is a source of meaning and significance, and not [make certain decisions about religious behaviour] because our grandparents would turn over in their graves if we didn't."

The fact that the Reform movement has recognized patrilineal descent since 1983 is an issue in terms of Jewish continuity in the eyes of the Conservative and Orthodox movements, which hold to the traditional position that born Jews are halachically Jewish only if they are born to a Jewish mother.

Within the Reform movement, patrilineality is not controversial, but it is problematic, said Rabbi Washofsky. "If one parent is Jewish and you raise the child Jewish, we will accept him or her as Jewish. Within the movement, however, problems arise if a child is being raised as part of two religions."

In such a case, said Rabbi Washofsky, who chairs the responsa committee of the Reform rabbinic umbrella, the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the children are not considered Jewish by the Reform movement and, according to his committee's recommendations and Reform Halachah – a term he admits many Reform Jews don't like – would require conversion, even if their mother is Jewish.

However, he noted, Reform Halachah "doesn't mean that someone in the Reform movement has the power to make decisions for all Reform Jews." The term, as Rabbi Washofsky explains it, is closely tied with the idea of facilitating discussion.

Camp founder to be honoured at gala tribute

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Harold Nashman, grandfather of two children at the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School and a key supporter of the school, is being honoured at a special gala event next week.

The event, which will be held at the Al Green Theatre at the Miles Nadal JCC 7:30 p.m. on May 10, coincides with two other important milestones for Nashman. The owner, co-founder and longtime director of Camp Wahanowin, and co-founder of the National Music Camp of Canada, will be celebrating the camps' 50th and 40th anniversaries, respectively, this summer.

The school is also honouring Nashman, father of five and grandfather of 11, for his community service, which includes 21 years at Aish HaTorah. In addition to his fundraising role, he and his late wife, Yetta, founded the Jewish Family Institute at the Village Shul. They also ran singles groups through UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The highlight of the gala will be a variety show directed by Leah Cherniak and emceed by actor Alon Nashman, Harold's son and a father of two students at the school. Scheduled performers include The Producers' co-star Michael Therriault, singer Amy Sky, violinist Barry Shiffman, Hairspray producer Avery Saltzman, comedienne Deb Filler, Quartetto Gelato and The Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band.

Nashman is modest about his involvement with the school.

"I've been of some help to the school with fundraising. I'm interested in Jewish education. I support the school and what it represents in the broadest sense."

Nashman began his camping career in the 1940s as a counsellor at Camp Ogama. At the time, his mother, Anne Nashman, a caterer, owned and operated a lodge at Crystal Beach.

A year after she was widowed in 1952, Anne heard that the owner of Camp Hiawatha was going to be renting out the property and decided to start a camp, recalls Nashman.

"I was a fourth-year law student at the time. It was February 1953. I was preparing for my final exams and my mother came along with this idea.

"'You're the camp guy,' she said. 'I'll take care of the food.' I continued to do my thing and we'd go out to promote the camp. She singlehandedly filled up the camp by phoning people from various organizational lists and she even received the waiting list from Camp Winnebago."

By the summer, they were operating at full capacity with 90 campers. Before the first season, Ben Wise joined them as a partner. A year later, they bought the 20-acre site of the former Camp B'nai Brith on Lake Couchiching. They subsequently bought an adjacent 85-acre cattle ranch, some shoreline from the neighbouring YMCA's Geneva Park and 18 acres on Lake St. John, a 45-minute hike from the main camp.

Harold Nashman with his late wife Anne.

Nashman practised law briefly, retiring in 1958 to focus on running the camp.

Camp Wahanowin, which now has 400 campers, will mark its 50th anniversary with a weekend reunion Aug. 20 to 22.

Nashman says the secret to the camp's success is that "everyone feels important," adding that the camp director is "hands-on and involved with the kids and staff."

In 1959, he and Wise founded Camp Manitouwabing, a music art and tennis specialty camp in Parry Sound. The partnership ended in 1979 when their children grew older and became involved with the camps. The Wises took over Manitouwabing.

For Nashman, camp was very much a family affair. His late wife – she died in 2000 – five children and mother all played a role.

"My wife was a very active and inspirational person. She had a lot of human-relations skills.

"[She] was very active in dealing with campers and staff. She was very religious and had a Jewish perspective on problem-solving that was useful and helpful. The kids really benefited."

In the longtime role as "camp mother," Anne Nashman was known as Bubby Nash to the campers.

"They enjoyed talking to her and listening to her words of advice."

While all the Nashman children worked at the camp in leadership roles, only one continues to be involved today. Bruce is the full-time camp director, while Nashman refers to himself as the "director emeritus," describing his role today as the "Camp Zaidy. The parents and the kids like that and I like that, too."

The National Music Camp of Canada is held at the Camp Wahanowin site the last two weeks of the summer as well as on weekends during the spring and fall.

"We run music camps for the Toronto District School Board," he says.

Nashman figures that on a yearly basis, 3,000 to 5,000 children, including the Wahanowin campers, spend time up at the camp.

"Multiply that by 50 years and it starts to add up."

Running the camp has given him tremendous satisfaction, he says.

"I'm up all summer. It's not just a job. It's a great way of life."

The Downtown Jewish Day School was founded in 1996 by a small group of Jewish parents living downtown. Today, it has more than 70 students. For more information on the May 10 event, called "A Lifetime of Commitment," call the school at 416-928-3537.

Women's Campaign & Advocacy installs new executive

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

Fran Sonshine is the new chair of UJA Federation's Women's Campaign & Advocacy (WC&A).

Outgoing chair Barbara Bregman passed the reins to Sonshine and incoming vice chair Linda Frum at WC&A's recent annual installation, following a record-setting year in which WC&A raised close to $7 million and an impressive 60 new Lions of Judah came on board.

The Lion of Judah distinction is given to women who make annual contributions of at least $5,000 to the UJA Federation annual campaign.

After praising the success of the previous executive, Sonshine described her vision for the future. "My goal for Women's Campaign & Advocacy is to engage as many women in our community as possible, so that we can raise our voices about the issues that affect us, our families, and the Jewish world. The more women involved in our work, the more revenue will be generated to deal with today's challenges and, in turn, help to preserve our Jewish values of Tzedakah and Tikun Olam."

"Together, we raised the money," said Bregman. "Together we advocated for the Jewish community both in Israel and at home. Together we dedicated ourselves to strengthening Jewish life. Together we acted as role models for a future generation of leaders."

The evening's keynote speaker was Bernie Farber, executive director, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region, who addressed the recent antisemitc activity throughout the Greater Toronto Area.

"We must not be cowed by acts of antisemitism in our midst. We must use it to galvanize our purpose," said Farber. "We must ensure proper protection for our community and we must move forward in building a fence of protection both for our institutions, our people and our ideals. Ridding the world of antisemitism is an integral part of defending these ideals by all those who cherish and share them."

The other members of the UJA Federation Women's Campaign & Advocacy 2005 Executive are: Yetta Bregman and Sandra Waldman, Atarah chairs; Renee Gozlan and Honey Rubenstein, Lion of Judah chairs; Tobie Bekhor and Hinda Silber, LOJ Endowment chairs; Linda Waks and Liora Yakubowicz, Pacesetters chairs; Fern Gitter, Marley Greenglass and Robyn Ptasznik, Telethon chairs; Judy Nyman, Board Development chair, Andrea Cohen and Lisa Draper, Advocacy chairs, and Members-at-large; Carole Grafstein C.M., Lesley Binstock Offman, Sarah Perlis and Dodi Weill.

Two emergency funds created to help Israel's young olim

Immigrant students receive support

The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner, has announced two new emergency funds designed to benefit young immigrants to Israel (olim): The Emergency Fund for Immigrant Students Alone in Israel, and The Emergency Fund to Prevent Immigrant Youth from Dropping Out.

Despite the relentless Palestinian violence that has plagued Israel for nearly four years, thousands of young people have made 'aliyah – many without their families – through one of the JAFI programs.

There are currently 8,500 young immigrants in Israel today and most arrive in their new home with little money, making higher education virtually impossible without financial assistance.

Now, as a direct result of Israel's ongoing security and economic crisis, the government has cut substantial funding for new immigrant students. As a result, an estimated 4,000 of them have been put at risk of completing their education – a critical milestone for young immigrants if they are to successfully integrate into Israeli society.

The goal of the Fund for Immigrant Students Alone in Israel is to ensure that these young people have every opportunity to complete their studies, despite the hardships they face.

The Fund to Prevent Immigrant Youth from Dropping Out has been created to counter the effects of government cutbacks and low household incomes, which have led to more than 15% of new immigrant high school students dropping out.

Most of these youngsters come from families suffering from extreme financial distress, many are from single-parent families, and a high percentage are from the former Soviet Union. Many of the children have adjustment problems, including language difficulties and behavioural problems.

The new JAFI fund will provide personalized intervention for these students to improve their Hebrew-language skills, strengthen learning skills, and even provide basic school supplies.

There are currently 8,500 young immigrants in Israel.

Confronting antisemitism by rejecting the sounds of silence

By LESLIE GALES
Chair, UJA Federation

It often begins silently, but insidiously - with quiet, hateful footsteps torching schools, desecrating graves and spray painting houses in the middle of the night. Unless it is exposed forcefully and condemned loudly, antisemitism can continue to seep through society, moving from the fringes until it is considered acceptable behaviour.

Over the past couple of months, we have come face to face with the new world in which we live, where the perception that antisemitism is acceptable empowers perpetrators of hate.

However, here in Toronto, and in Montreal, we have dealt antisemites a rude surprise. Despicable acts were greeted with a chorus of condemnation from top political, corporate, community and religious leaders at every level. Canadians will not tolerate intolerance.

Yet, the anti-Semitic actions that led to such widespread outrage, were an eye-opening episode for our community. We need to assess community security, raise funds to improve and it and work with government officials to assist us.

UJA Federation recently established Jewish Toronto's first Task Force on Community Security, chaired by Warren Kimel, which will be cooperating closely with police forces and governments to consider security at our institutions and offer recommendations for the new realities with which we are dealing.

At the same time, we intend, together with our community partners, to step up our advocacy efforts and create an even stronger voice for Jewish Canadians, in addition to helping our young people recognize forces of hatred.

Antisemitism breeds in silence and blossoms when confronted by silence. We are fortunate to live in an exceptional city and a remarkable country which does not consider silence an acceptable option - an enlightened attitude - which will make the difficult task of improving Jewish community security a lot easier.

Miles Nadal to receive prestigious award

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA Federation

The man behind the revitalization of an important Toronto Jewish landmark has been named this year's recipient of the Outstanding Volunteer Award, presented annually by the Greater Toronto chapter of the Association of Fundraising Professionals.

Miles Nadal, the man and the name behind the new 43,000 square foot, state-of-the-art Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at the corner of Spadina and Bloor, will be presented with the prestigious award at the 10th AFP Philanthropy Awards later this year.

Nadal is being honoured for his philanthropic efforts with UJA Federation and Mount Sinai Hospital.

"Obviously, my family and I are honoured to be recognized for our philanthropic activities, but we also feel so privileged through our association with Toronto's remarkable Jewish community," says Nadal. "Seeing the new community centre come to fruition is a dream come true, and to know that it will benefit generations of Jewish Torontonians, is tremendous. It's easy to make a living, but it's tough to make a difference."

With Nadal's generosity and tireless efforts, the new centre – a project of UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow initiative – replaced the aging Bloor JCC, a move made necessary by the ongoing growth of Toronto's downtown Jewish community.

"Miles has great vision. Not too many other volunteers in the community saw what he saw at the Bloor and Spadina location where the new Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre is located," says Leslie Gales, UJA Federation board chair. "Not only did he have the vision, but also the capacity, the passion and the desire to go out and assist the community in raising additional funds for the new centre. Hats off to Miles Nadal. It's volunteers like Miles who make our Toronto so fabulous."

"Miles is one of those people who knows how to make things happen," says Nicholas Offord, president, Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation of Toronto. "He was instrumental in the establishment of Leadership Sinai (Mount Sinai's young leaders group). He seized the vision and brought in the right people to get it off the ground. As a volunteer, he is one of those rare people that sees the possibilities and can overcome the many challenges along the way."

Toronto rabbis ready to graduate from Israel study program

Two Toronto rabbis will graduate from an important study program this summer, equipped with enhanced knowledge to invigorate their personal Jewish study, their synagogue-based teaching, and their role as transmitters of Torah to the community.

Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl of Beth Tzedec Congregation and Rabbi John Moscowitz of Holy Blossom Temple were the only Canadians among the 19 rabbis taking part in the Shalom Hartman Institute's Centre for Rabbinic Enrichment (CRE).

The CRE is a three-year program which serves as a resource and training centre for leading rabbis. It empowers them to develop ways in which Jewish tradition can address an open, modern world.

Founded in 1976, the Shalom Hartman Institute in Jerusalem is a leading innovator in the field of pluralistic Jewish thought and education.

The program is divided between study in Jerusalem and the rabbi's home community, four hours of long-distance classes via video-conferences, and individual and havruta (partner) study.

The primary funding for Toronto participants is provided by UJA Federation.

"This experience has given me a wonderful opportunity to study with top-flight scholars and thinkers, to deepen my connection with Eretz Yisrael and to think with colleagues about the best way to teach critical Jewish ideas to our congregations," says Frydman-Kohl. "The dialogue shared among colleagues was a rare treat and challenge. I learned much from the experience. The immersion in Jerusalem's culture was also a wonderful opportunity for me and my family."

"I first came to David Hartman 25 years ago through his writings," says Moscowitz. "I then came a bit closer by attending some seminars at the Hartman Institute in the early nineties; and then over the last three years I've had the opportunity to study with David and his colleagues through the CRE program," says Moscowitz. "He and they are what they appear to be: interested in excellence, learning, irreverent about things like superficial differences and able to galvanize Jews of all kinds through learning, toward G-d, Torah and community."

Rabbi John Moscowitz (L) and Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl at Jerusalem's Hartman Institute.

A new class of 30 rabbis from 13 cities is currently being recruited for the new cycle, which will begin this summer, including three new candidates from Toronto. Over the next 15 years, the program hopes to reach over 150 rabbis.

Dance Fever hits CHAT

The 34th annual Rikudiya, held recently at CHAT's Tanenbaum Campus, featured more than 350 students from 18 schools. The theme of this year's Rikudiya was "If you will it, it is no dream," in honour of Theodore Herzl, the author of that expression, who died 100 years ago. The event was co-sponsored by UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, Koffler Centre of the Arts, the Bathurst JCC, and the United Way of Toronto. (Pictured) Dancers from the CHAT Richmond Hill group show their moves.

Bringing Ben Yehudah to you

Following the May 30th UJA Federation Walk with Israel, participants will be able to purchase some of Israel's finest wares and help Israel's economy in the process.

An estimated two dozen Israeli merchants - as well as several local storekeepers - will be setting up shop at an Israeli Mini Mall at Ontario Place as part of the RioCan Festival, after the Walk.

Some of the Israeli goods that will be available include: beauty products, T-shirts, hats, army pins and medals, magnets, key-chains, talitot, talit / tefillin bags, challa boards and covers, hand towels, chanukiot, Jerusalem stone items, hamsas, hand painted wood products by Emanuel, pictures, post cards, kiddush cups, pewter and/or silver products, and much, much more.

Be part of the UJA Federation Walk with Israel, the largest solidarity walk in the world on Israel's behalf. For more infomation, call 416.631.5700 or visit www.jewishtoronto.com

. Entry to Ontario Place is by sponsorship of $54 or more, or by purchasing a pass for $10 at Coronation Park between 9:30 and 10:30 a.m.

Tell Israel you care by being there!

Mizrachi service marks 'moment between tragedy, joy'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Baruch Shapiro was 18 when he came to Israel with his father. He was the only remaining child of a family of six children – the rest died in Auschwitz.

As soon as he arrived, he was handed a gun so he could fight with the nascent Israeli army. He fell on the road to Jerusalem.

Ami was a talented teacher at a hesder yeshiva who was known for his empathy and selflessness. Six months after his wedding, he called his wife to say he would be home in less than half an hour. He never returned. He died in a terror attack.

These were two of the personal stories told at this year's Yom Hazikaron-Yom Ha'atzmaut memorial service and celebration sponsored by Mizrachi Organization of Canada, Emunah Women, Yavneh and Bnei Akiva, which was held at Beth Avraham Yoseph synagogue.

They are two examples of the high cost paid for Israel's survival and its right to exist, master of ceremonies Shlomie Romberg said.

The transition from a day of reflection to a day of celebration, from mourning to happiness, is "how Jews mark things. That's the Jewish psyche," Romberg said.

As is traditional, the Yom Hazikaron part of the program was a mix of prayer and memorial: prayers for the welfare of missing soldiers; K'El Maleh Rachamim for those who died in Israel's wars and military actions; the lighting of a yahrtzeit candle; and solemn musical selections performed by Rabbi Avichai Zehavi.

A moment of silence was punctuated by the shrill wail of an air raid siren.

Teens from Bnei Akiva, the youth movement of Mizrachi, in white shirts and blue cord ties, read selections in English and Hebrew from stories of remembrance. "We know what it feels like to win a city, but lose our sons," read one passage.

The students also told a story about how Israel's founders decided on what colour the flag should be: they felt it should not be red, the colour of war and blood, but blue, the colour of sea and sky, children's eyes, and hope.

Rabbi Baruch Taub, spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph, said that all Israel wants is to be a normal country with normal borders that are internationally recognized, and for its people to be able to live normal lives.

However, "while we beg the world to recognize us as normal, we realize that we are anything but normal," he said.

Israel's whole existence – learning to be resilient after sacrifice, its women bearing children to carry on the name of older siblings, and dealing with both suffering and victories – is anything but normal, Rabbi Taub said.

The service, he said, marked a "moment between tragedy and joy," between maintaining ties to the past and dreams of the future.

He illustrated his point with the story of Moshe Segev, who in the 1920s, although forbidden to do so by the British authorities, blew a shofar at the tiny alley at the Kotel, where Jews were allowed to pray on Yom Kippur. He sat in jail for a year-and-a-half for his act.

On Yom Kippur in 1967, when the Western Wall was once again in Jewish hands, he was taken to the Kotel and once more blew the shofar.

That may not be a normal story, Rabbi Taub said, but "it's our story, the merging of the past and the future."

Participants celebrated Israeli independence day at Beth Avraham Yoseph synagogue as part of a service that also marked Yom Hazikaron.

David Bernstein led a special Yom Ha'atzmaut service authorized by the Chief Rabbinate of Israel.

Students of Ulpanat Orot Girls' High School also set up a special exhibit in the shul lobby with photographs and short biographies of the nearly 1,000 victims of Arab terrorism since September 2000.

The evening ended with dancing, music and snacks.

Shul concert to celebrate Yom Yerushalayim

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

An annual cantorial concert that is marking its 75th anniversary will be held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on May 19 at 7:30 p.m.

Titled "Celebrate Yom Yerushalayim: the Beauty of Jerusalem," this year's event features four world-renowned cantors will perform a wide-ranging program made up of cantorial, chassidic, Hebrew and other musical genres to commemorate the reunification of Israel's capital city.

Joining cantors Yaakov Motzen and Shlomo Sufrin of Shaarei Shomayim will be Cantor Naftali Herstik, chief cantor of the Great Synagogue of Jerusalem, and Cantor Colin Schachat of Jerusalem.

They will be accompanied by the Shaarei Shomayim Choir, conducted by Bryan Bessner, and pianist Daniel Gildar, a cantor from Philadelphia.

"No matter what is going on in the world, Jerusalem has been and always will be the focal point of Jews everywhere. It will always be our holy and spiritual centre," said Louis Zeifman, chair of the concert committee, adding that the event will "share Jerusalem's incredible beauty and mysticism with the entire Toronto community."

Motzen, a native of Tel Aviv who performs throughout the world, joined Shaarei Shomayim in 1997.

Cantor Sufrin, a sought-after performer, released his first album, That Special Melody, in 1993. He has since collaborated with top performers in Jewish music and has made two albums with Motzen, Made in Canada and A Guide to the Passover Seder.

Herstik, director of the Tel Aviv Cantorial Institute, has performed with the London Festival Orchestra, the Jerusalem Symphony Orchestra, the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra and in Prague, Zurich and many other European and North American cities.

He officiated at the Linksfield Senderwood Hebrew Congregation in Johannesburg prior to immigrating to Israel in 1992. He has been a baritone soloist with the Jerusalem Oratorio Choir, the National Symphony Orchestra of South Africa, the Los Angeles Jewish Symphony and the Lithuanian State Orchestra. He has released five CDs.

Rabbi Moshe Shulman, spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim, said that our songs about Jerusalem must be louder today than ever before.

"It is particularly appropriate to honour Jerusalem through song as we are doing at the concert. The Bible, the Prophets and Psalms, speak of singing a new song to God over the rebuilding of Jerusalem."

Referring to the concert's outstanding cantors and musicians, the rabbi said, "Together they bring the sounds of the soul of Israel to our community and allow us to feel, if only for a little while, as if we are standing on the hills overlooking Jerusalem, and singing the songs of Jerusalem."

Tickets for the concert are $55, $40 and $25. To reserve tickets or place an ad in the concert journal, call 416 789 3213 or visit www.shomayim.org.

CHAT students do well in Israeli physics competition

By FRANCES KRAFT

Unlike their Israeli counterparts, the eight students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) who participated in a recent physics tournament in Israel will not be exempt from their final exam because of their high standing in the competition.

But the grade 11 and 12 students were nevertheless excited about their experience at the ninth annual Shalheveth Freier Physics Tournament at the Weizmann Institute of Science March 30 and 31.

"It was such a great experience for me. There was so much to learn there [and] we just had the best time," said Adina Feinberg, captain of the four-person team from CHAT's Richmond Hill branch.

Feinberg's mother Faith said the contest showed Adina that what she learned in school is applicable in real life. Barry Hennick, head of the science department at CHAT's Tannenbaum campus, thanked the parents for allowing their children to travel to Israel at a time of turmoil in the country.

Michael Mayer, national executive vice-president of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, said their presence on campus at a difficult time "did [the Israelis] so much good."

The two CHAT teams were the first-ever Diaspora competitors. The Richmond Hill team, consisting of Grade 11 students, and the Tanenbaum campus team, made up of Grade 12 students, each had to use its scientific expertise to build a locking device for a 16x12x10-inch particle board and plexiglass box. The components, standardized across the competition, were provided by Weizmann.

The Grade 12 team, whose box bore protruding wires, raised suspicions at the Toronto airport, causing a minor delay. At the tournament, where part of the event involves each team trying to break into other team's boxes, their creation stymied all the other students who tried, contributing to their standing in the top 30 of 53 teams who entered.

Their spring lock could only be released in a two-step process, begun by inserting a magnet to close an electrical circuit in one of two relays, or mechanical chips. The students used a measuring device called a MultiMeter to power the second relay. When the device measures resistance, explained team captain Yonatan Stratievsky, it sends out two volts of electricity.

"Once you know how to do it, it's incredibly simple," said Stratievsky, whose teammates were Alen Reyhan, David Kadish and Matthew Jackson.

The hands-on experience of trying to open the other teams' safes – the Grade 12 team cracked four; the other CHAT competitors cracked three – was "probably the best way to learn," said Ryan Herblum, a member of Feinberg's team along with Jory Stern and Ryan Katchky.

Their project was based on the principle that light is refracted differently by different liquids. To crack their safe, other students had to figure out in which locations inside the box to place separate dishes of glycerin and water, so that they would correctly refract light from a laser pointer, after which the light could be converted into an electrical current by a sensor.

CHAT's participation in the competition was facilitated by the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, and an anonymous donor covered most of their expenses.

"We probably learned more physics in those two days than we did all year at CHAT," said Katchky, at a recent celebratory event at Richmond Hill for students and their parents.

"Thanks a lot," quipped his teacher, Chuck Cohen, who added that the students did a super job. "I have never seen four kids work as hard to put something together as they did."

They also formed friendships with the Israeli participants, with whom they spoke in both Hebrew and English. They are still in touch with them, said Reyhan.

Their language skills were more of a challenge when it came to the technical part of the competition.

"CHAT teaches you Hebrew, but not [words like] 'quark' and 'neutrino'," said Kadish.

Although some of the CHAT students regretted that the modest decorations on their boxes didn't match the elaborate ones created by the Israelis, teacher Eli Honig of the Tanenbaum campus assured them that "it's the physics that counts, not all the fancy trappings."

"You've done us proud," said Gary Levine, principal of Richmond Hill.

Celebrating Yom Ha'atzmaut

AT EARL BALES PARK: Hundreds of people, many wearing blue and white, converged on Earl Bales Park last week to celebrate Israel's 56th birthday. Part of the celebration included an attempt to make history by forming the world's largest human Israeli flag. There was also entertainment by the Moshav Band and kosher Israeli food. The celebration was sponsored by Israel Now, a consortium of more than 115 community organizations under the auspices of UJA Federation and the Consulate General of Israel. [Carolyn Blackman photos]

AT BETH TZEDEC: Children and adults alike celebrated Israel's independence day last week at a family-oriented event at Beth Tzedec Congregation. The celebration was organized by the synagogue's young families committee, and co-sponsored by the Rabbinical Assembly, United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Canadian region, Canadian Foundation for Masorti Judaism and Mercaz-Canada. Anti-Semitism not rising: poll

CJN Staff

Despite recent high-profile incidents of vandalism and violence against Jewish property in Toronto and Montreal, most Canadians don't believe anti-Semitism is on the rise in this country, a new poll says.

When asked by Environics Research Group about the significance of the attacks, only one in four Canadians said they indicate that anti-Jewish sentiment is growing in Canada, while two-thirds said they're random acts of violence committed by hateful individuals.

"What is perhaps most striking about this opinion is its consistency across regions of the country and demographic subgroups of the population," said Environics senior vice-president Keith Neuman.

Only in Alberta do as many as one-third of residents believe these acts signify a trend, he said.

Canadians' attitudes on the incidents in Toronto and Montreal reflect more general beliefs about ethnic tolerance in this country, he added.

Only 17 per cent of Canadians believe anti-Jewish sentiment is growing among people they know, while more than twice as many – 36 per cent – say such sentiments are decreasing, and another eight per cent say there is no anti-Jewish sentiment in Canada at all.

Some 27 per cent believe there has been no change in the views of people they know.

Belief that anti-Semitism is rising is somewhat higher in Quebec, at 25 per cent, and is also more evident among Canadians who are not born in this country (26 per cent).

There is no consensus on the significance recent acts of vandalism even among Canadians who believe that anti-Semitism is a growing problem in this country, Neuman said.

That group is evenly divided between those who say the recent vandalism signals a growing problem – 46 per cent – and those who believe they are random acts – 50 per cent.

"Canadians are also more likely than not to feel that they themselves are becoming more tolerant of people of different colours and races," he said.

Three in 10 believe they are now more tolerant than before, compared with only eight per cent who acknowledge they have become less so.

"This represents modest progress since 1991, when 23 per cent said they were feeling more tolerant, compared with 10 per cent who said the opposite," Neuman said.

Some 62 per cent report no change in their degree of tolerance.

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Ron Singer said the fact the Toronto and Montreal incidents were "swiftly and universally condemned all the way up to the prime minister of Canada probably coloured the response."

The fact only 8 per cent of Canadians think there is no anti-Jewish sentiment at all in Canada shows the vast majority are aware that anti-Semitism exists in this country, Singer told The CJN.

He agreed that an increase in anti-Semitic incidents does not necessarily reflect general attitudes toward Jews, and that it's possible the recent incidents were random acts.

Overall, the poll results show a high level of tolerance among Canadians, but it would have been "more instructive" to ask Jewish Canadians whether they feel anti-Semitism is on the rise, he said.

Ruth Klein, national director of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, said the league's audit of anti-Semitic incidents in 2003 showed a 27 per cent increase over the previous year, which came after an "alarming" 60 per cent rise in 2002.

"This means that anti-Semitic activity has doubled in just two years. Whatever Canadians would prefer to believe, the statistics speak for themselves."

Environics interviewed 1,265 Canadians from April 8 to 18. The national results are accurate to within plus or minus 2.7 per cent, 95 times out of 100.

Outreach to 'unsaved' Jews

Chosen People Ministries is now on a fundraising campaign to move out of its offices in a house east of Bathurst Street on Sheppard Avenue and build a new "Toronto Messianic Jewish Centre."

It's easy to see how messianic Judaism can be viewed as a cult, said Don Meecha, Toronto branch director of Chosen People Ministries and "Director of Mission Operations" at Ohr HaMashiach (Light of Messiah), a new outfit located at 5845 Yonge St. in North York.

Despite not being considered the norm in Christianity, "we must make clear that we are at the foundation of Christian faith," Meecha said.

The question before messianic Jews is how to be "a viable option" to the Jewish community, which he described variously as "unsaved," "dying," and "perishing," and which "promotes expulsion" should any of its members embrace Jesus.

Why would Jews want to leave the comfort and security of their community, Meecha asked, "for one that offers only eternal life but nothing for them in this life?" And why do messianic Jews demand that normative Jews abandon their culture? "We would never demand this of another culture," he stated.

Instead, "why can't we plant a messianic synagogue that speaks Hebrew?" he asked. Jews on the path to Jesus should also be allowed to keep their traditional symbols and customs "as long as they do not violate the new covenant's [New Testament's] values."

But messianics "have missed the mark. We have not reached full potential to make them jealous enough to leave their dying community behind for one that offers eternal life."

Meecha's messianic paradigm "would be conducive to both Jewish and gentile salvation" but would practise the Protestant sacraments of baptism and the Eucharist. "We must provide a smooth transition… a new model."

That would include an education centre for children and teens.

Ultimately, the goal is to "no longer go into the Jewish community, but to be part of it." If not, a "spiritual holocaust will continue."

Meantime, messianic Jews "have to accept resentment, even if means being ostracized by family and friends. We do not have good relations with local Jewish leaders, to say the least."

Anti-Semitism conference called a 'success'

Indeed, in his speech to delegates, Graham conceded that for Canada, in the wake of a spate of anti-Semitic attacks, "the need for a conference of this kind has recently, alas, become all too evident."

Canadians "pride themselves on sharing common citizenship in a successful pluralist society marked by respect for diversity. Yet we too are still struggling to achieve these ideals."

Since a similar OSCE conference on anti-Semitism last June, "Canada has had to confront the reality of disgraceful attacks on our Jewish community, including hateful graffiti, vandalism, the desecration of cemeteries and the firebombing of a Jewish elementary school.

"These trends are deeply disturbing to a country such as Canada. They have instilled great concern in the Jewish community and led to soul-searching among all of our citizens committed to ensuring that our country continues to be a model of pluralism and mutual respect."

Graham said Canada has begun tackling the problem with the recent unveiling of a national plan to combat racism and anti-Semitism, and by convincing police forces to establish hate crime units.

"But clearly, these efforts are not enough," he said. "Together with the countries assembled here, we must, and we will, do more to defeat the virulent new forms of anti-Semitism infecting our societies."

That sentiment is reflected in the conference's final statement. The Berlin Declaration undertakes to gather "reliable information and statistics about anti-Semitic crimes, as well as other hate crimes," and report them to the OSCE's Office for Democratic Institutions and Human Rights in Warsaw.

It also promises regular reviews of "legal systems to ensure they foster a safe environment free of anti-Semitic harassment, violence or discrimination, and calls for educational programs to combat anti-Semitism and promote remembrance of the Holocaust."

Some observers took the conference to task for failing to condemn the growth of anti-Semitism among European Muslims, despite a resolution that declared "unambiguously that international developments or political issues, including those in Israel or elsewhere in the Middle East, never justify anti-Semitism."

Graham touched on this in his speech, saying that Mideast tensions "cannot be allowed to undermine the social fabric of our countries.

"It would be naive not to recognize that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is having an impact on the way in which our citizens view each other," he said. "But… we must not let the turbulence in that region infect our own societies, or serve as a pretext for anti-Semitism or any form of discrimination."

'It would be naive not to recognize that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is having an impact'

Graham said he was familiar with the results of a survey released by the Anti-Defamation League during the conference that showed a possible drop in anti-Semitic attitudes in most European countries, but counterbalanced by a sharp rise in anti-Israel sentiment.

"There was a general recognition [at the conference] that the traditional type of anti-Semitism is probably on a decline," he said. But there was also recognition "that events in the Middle East are pushing young people, particularly a lot of radicals, to use Israel as a reason to attack Jewish people."

He said conference delegates recognized "a link between Muslim extremism and anti-Semitism, but they also recognized there were a lot of Muslim moderates."

Graham said the next step is to fight anti-Semitism on the Internet.

In June, an OSCE meeting will be held in Paris to focus on the use of the Internet to promote hate crimes and the spreading of racist, xenophobic and anti-Semitic propaganda.

A third event, to be held by the OSCE in Brussels in September, will examine the wider problems of racism, xenophobia and discrimination across the OSCE region.

Canada was also represented at the Berlin gathering by Senator Jerry Grafstein, Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy and acting executive vice-president Manuel Prutschi, and by David Matas, senior honorary legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada.

A few days before last week's conference, an Israeli anti-Semitism watchdog found that worldwide incidents of attacks on Jews and vandalism against Jewish sites increased 15 per cent in 2003 from the previous year.

The Stephen Roth Institute of Contemporary Anti-Semitism and Racism said France, Britain, Russia, Germany and Canada had the highest rates of anti-Semitic incidents. The report also said that most of the attacks were committed by Muslim youths.

Israel-U.S. economic ties said a mistake

By NATALIE RUSKIN
Special to The CJN

Middle East journalist Joel Bainerman often draws his fair share of critics, but his lecture at Beth Emeth Synagogue last week about the rise and fall of Israel's high-tech industry was greeted with nods.

When the ex-Torontonian moved to Israel in 1981, it didn't take long before he began gathering criticism for his unpopular and unconventional views on Israeli political and economic affairs. With this latest lecture topic, "Broken Promises: The Rise and Fall of Israel's Technology-Based Industries," Bainerman says his critics have finally decided to ignore him.

Using the 1980s-1990s as his frame of reference, Bainerman said, "Israeli high-tech went from serving the needs of the Israeli economy and hence the Israeli public, to catering to the short- term needs of foreign investors and Venture Capital fund managers."

Israel's high-tech industry was booming in the 1980s, and the priority was to boost the nation's economy and serve the greater public good, Bainerman said. But by the mid 1990s, when Wall Street discovered Israeli technology, Israelis got caught up in the American dream of start-ups and quick returns and the promise of a booming Israeli economy fell apart. Whereas in the 1980s, Israel was the manufacturing base for its own ideas, the 1990s were about selling Israeli ideas and then manufacturing the product elsewhere, in places such as Silicon Valley.

Bainerman said the Israeli government and the public allowed their ideas to be exported because "[they] thought it was good PR.

"In the 1990s, the Israeli government became the chief advocate for these venture acquisitions because they thought it would improve Israel's public image."

But Israel made a fatal mistake, he said.

"Israelis were not respected in the U.S. marketing world.

"In the U.S., if you spoke with an accent, you were a foreigner – Israelis had to hide their origins."

With the start of the intifadah in 2000, Israel became a war zone in American eyes and "Israeli high-tech was no longer sexy," Bainerman said.

The crash of Israeli start-ups was a reality check for Israel: what's good for Israel is not necessarily what's good for Silicon Valley.

"The U.S. market is not Israel's natural market," he said.

"You can't run a corporation across an ocean because Israelis like to micromanage their own company."

Europe, on the other hand, is a better partner for Israel, both politically and economically, Bainerman said.

"Eventually the U.S. market will fall, and Israel will want to be aligned with Europe."

Bainerman's speech completed a series of visiting scholars sponsored by Beth Emeth's continuing education program.

Holocaust arts event at Wolfond Centre

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center's second annual arts-related Holocaust commemoration event will take place Sunday afternoon, May 16, at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Life, with Hillel of Greater Toronto as a first-time co-sponsor.

"Echoes: Artistic Expressions of the Holocaust" will showcase visual art including paintings and sculptures, as well as book and poetry readings, film and performance art.

In addition to the venue, which has moved from the Sheppard Grande theatre, the scope of the event has also changed. This year organizers invited other communities – including the Rwandan community, which marks its own 10-year genocide anniversary this month – to participate.

> 'Our aim is to honour the memory of the Holocaust and to show through art the idea that there's hope for the future'

"If we can all learn about each other's histories, then I think we're all better off," said Noah Slepkov, a fourth-year York University student, active Hillel member and member of the eight-person organizing committee for Echoes who began volunteering for the Wiesenthal Center last year.

"Our aim is to honour the memory of the Holocaust and to show through art the idea that there's hope for the future," said organizer Alexandra Battiston, a third-year student at Osgoode Hall Law School.

The idea for the original exhibit came from the artistic and literary submissions that were sent unsolicited to the Wiesenthal office, she said. A volunteer at the centre for more than two years, Battison began working for its director of national affairs, Leo Adler, as a first-year law student as part of Pro Bono Students Canada, a program that matches law student volunteers with community agencies.

At the time Battiston, who is not Jewish, hadn't heard of the centre. "It's been a great learning experience," she said.

As of last week, organizers had received about 30 submissions from as far away as British Columbia. Artists include author Donia Blumenfeld Clenman, a Holocaust survivor, as well as Rwandan-born artist Gertrude Kearns, who is best known for a series of portraits of retired Canadian general Romeo Dallaire.

The event runs from noon to 6 p.m. on May 16 at the Wolfond Centre, 36 Harbord St. There is no charge for admission.

Senate hears presentations on anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress is urging the Senate to endorse a resolution against anti-Semitism passed by the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE).

In prepared remarks delivered last month to the Senate's standing committee on human rights, Congress president Keith Landy said Canada should condemn manifestations of anti-Semitism "at every opportunity in multilateral forums… and in the context of its global bilateral relations.

"Canada should use the moral authority we have gained over the years as a nation dedicated to human rights, democracy and security of the person to enhance our leadership role in the international campaign against anti-Semitism," he said.

Landy also urged Canadian governments to consider the anti-Semitic motivation of terrorist groups and to consider ways of helping the Jewish community address its security burden.

Eric Vernon, a member of Congress' Senate delegation, said the presentation was purposely broad and the representatives had hoped to flesh out their views in a question-and answer-period that had been scheduled after formal presentations were concluded. Unfortunately, time was limited and that discussion never took place.

CJC urges government to help community address security burden

There is a possibility the committee will schedule a second hearing to again canvas the views of participants, he said.

Congress joined B'nai Brith Canada and the Canadian Race Relations Foundation in presentations that lasted barely an hour.

The resolution was introduced to the Senate by Senator Jerry Grafstein, treasurer of the OSCE's Parliamentary Assembly. It took Grafstein almost 1½ years to convince his Senate colleagues to agree to debate the resolution, which calls on member states to unequivocally condemn anti-Semitism and address legislatively the growing phenomenon.

Actor lends support to UTT

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – They tried to keep it confidential at his request, but it didn't take long for the news to get out that actor Russell Crowe made an undisclosed donation to United Talmud Torahs (UTT) to help rebuild its library, which was firebombed April 5.

UTT spokesperson Shelley Paris confirmed that the actor called the St. Laurent school when it reopened after Passover and spoke to principal Soly Benamron and executive director Sidney Benudiz. Neither the school nor Crowe's publicist Lee Anne Muldoon would reveal the amount of his donation to replace books, and Muldoon told The CJN that Crowe was not available for comment.

"We tried to respect his request for anonymity, but the students were told and then, I guess, it soon spread and was picked up by the media," said Paris, adding that Crowe wanted the children to know that he was thinking about them, but otherwise did not want his act to be made public.

"He was very upset by what had happened, that a place of learning should be attacked that way… It was a huge morale boost for the school community," Paris said.

New Zealand-born Crowe, known for his Academy Award-nominated role in The Insider and his Academy Award-winning roles in The Gladiator and A Beautiful Mind, has been in Toronto for the shooting of Cinderella Man, a movie about the life of boxer James J. Braddock.

UTT has received countless messages of support and offers of material help from throughout Canada and other countries.

Among the most recent is that of the Montreal chapter of the Association of Jewish Libraries, which, in association with the librarians of other Jewish day schools and the Jewish Public Library, has formed a committee to help with the planning of the new UTT library. They are working with UTT librarian Dan Holobow in designing what is hoped to be a state-of-the-art facility.

"As professional librarians, we have offered our expertise in collection development, physical layout and integration of technology for the new library," said Marsha Lustigman, a Bialik High School librarian.

Elsewhere, UTT and Herzliah High School (St. Laurent) graduate Samantha Singer is planning a 30-hour roller/ball hockey game for May 15-16 at the Butler Building in Cote St. Luc's Pierre Elliott Trudeau Park. Players are seeking sponsors as a means of raising funds for UTT.

Singer said last week she was still waiting for permission to hold the event, but was hopeful. Close to 30 players have already signed up.

Singer, who graduated in 2001, said, "My heart broke when I heard the news and my eyes filled with tears and my stomach churned as I stood in the library.

Coast to Coast

Now who's massacring the truth?

Martin Himel's documentary, Jenin: Massacring Truth, which premiered April 28 on Global TV, explored how much of the European media misreported Israel's military operation in Jenin in April 2002, leading to charges – eventually disproved by the United Nations and major human rights organizations – that Israel massacred hundreds of Palestinian civilians.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The documentary received mainly favourable comments in the Canadian media. One dissenting note came from the Toronto Star's media columnist Antonia Zerbisias. Her column, "Yet one more salvo over Jenin" (April 27), while not totally critical of the documentary, made the point that it was Himel who, ultimately, did a disservice to the truth.

Zerbisias, who has written not infrequently – and usually critically – about Israel, did explain the context in which the Jenin operation occurred: "In April 2002, after a wave of horrific suicide bombings in Israel that killed and maimed hundreds of civilians, the Israeli [sic] Defence Forces moved into the heavily populated Jenin refugee camp."

She noted that the Palestinian side grossly exaggerated the Palestinian death toll in the operation, saying hundreds had been killed, a number many journalists quoted.

In the end, investigations proved that 26 Palestinian civilians and 23 Israeli soldiers were killed. Zerbisias even wrote that the IDF fatalities "might have been avoided had the military attacked from the air rather than rely[ing] on its infantry."

At the time, about 25 per cent of the terrorist attacks against Israel originated in Jenin. As Himel's documentary revealed, the IDF decided not to use air power specifically to avoid killing large numbers of Palestinian civilians. The IDF chose to conduct house-to-house fighting in order to identify the Palestinian fighters from among the civilians.

Such actions are a testament to the moral fibre of the IDF. Himel contrasted the Jenin operation with NATO's bombing of Serbia and Kosovo over several weeks in 1999, which resulted in the deaths of hundreds of civilians. In the latter case, no charges of massacre or war crimes were ever leveled.

Zerbisias saved most of her criticism for what she described as Himel's determination "to demonstrate that anti-Semitism is to blame for how the 'Euro-British media' reported on Jenin."

She referred to Himel's interview with the London Times' Janine di Giovanni, who wrote, in April 2002, that Jenin was worse than Chechnya and Bosnia. In the documentary, di Giovanni asked Himel if he was Israeli or Jewish. Zerbisias, who recognizes di Giovanni's malice, nonetheless accused Himel of using her to "tar all journalists" with an anti-Semitic brush – a charge that is completely unfounded.

Zerbisias then took aim at Alan Dershowitz, the Harvard law professor and author of The Case for Israel, whom Himel interviews in the documentary. Zerbisias wrote that Dershowitz "supplies observations that darkly allude to how anti-Semitic any criticism of the Israeli government really is."

Nothing Dershowitz said in the feature even vaguely supports her allegation. In addition, had Zerbisias read his book, which she attempts to demean, she would have found this passage: "So long as criticism [of Israel] is comparative, contextual, and fair, it should be encouraged, not disparaged. But when the Jewish nation is the only one criticized for faults that are far worse among other nations, such criticism crosses the line from fair to foul, from acceptable to anti-Semitic."

Indeed, on the CBC program Counterspin (October 8, 2003), Dershowitz criticized some Israeli policies: "I'm opposed to the occupation, I'm opposed to the settlements." Using Zerbisias' logic, Dershowitz would have to call his own remarks anti-Semitic.

Zerbisias' sloppy reasoning extended to The Battle of Jenin: A Case Study in Israel's Communications Strategy, edited by Hirsh Goodman and Jonathan Cummings. To support her viewpoint, Zerbisias quoted one small paragraph from the introduction to the report, disregarding the fact that overall, a large number of the experts who contributed to the study (including Ze'ev Schiff and Ehud Ya'ari, among others) bolstered Himel and Dershowitz's arguments.

Paul Michaels is communications director for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Crowe supports UTT

"It was beyond my understanding that something so terrible could happen so close to my home and so close to my heart."

Singer wants to ensure that students "feel the same way I did when I attended UTT. It was my second home, and I believed that nothing bad could happen there."

Notre-Dame-de-Grace MNA Russell Copeman talked about how upset he was by the UTT incident in his speech to the National Assembly on Yom Hashoah. Copeman, who is Jewish, visited the library soon after it was destroyed by fire. He said he was struck by the image and odour of burnt books.

"I had thought such things could not happen in our home… It might happen elsewhere but not here, in Quebec, in 2004…

"It may be that this was a unique event, committed by a crank. That's possible. It may equally be that this event was perpetrated by a group. But I am sure of one thing, Mr. Speaker, in view of the communication left on the scene, that this was more than an act of simple vandalism."

Dairy-good ideas for Mother's Day or Shavuot

By NORENE GILLETZ

The month of May brings warm weather and several special celebrations, including Mother's Day on Sunday, May 9th and Shavuot, a two-day holiday that begins at sundown May 25th and lasts until sundown on May 27th. Celebrations are always associated with food and finding delicious and unusual dishes to serve your guests. I found many wonderful ideas in Phyllis and Miriyam Glazer's The Essential Book of Jewish Festival Cooking (Harper Collins, $45.95 Cdn).

Phyllis Glazer is an American-born food journalist and cookbook author based in Tel Aviv. Miriyam Glazer is a professor of literature at the University of Judaism in Los Angeles and the editor of several books. The two sisters have teamed up to provide a new and fascinating approach to Jewish festival cuisine.

The Essential Book of Jewish Festival Cooking is a valuable resource for the Jewish holidays. Organized by season, the 10 chapters cover the major holidays and feast days of the Jewish year. There are more than 200 tempting recipes, featuring flavours from around the world, plus menus and tips for creative and meaningful holiday entertaining.

Each chapter provides an introduction illustrating the origins, traditions and seasonal and biblical significance of each Jewish holiday and its foods. The recipes add a fresh, contemporary twist to the flavours of the foods enjoyed by our ancestors.

For Shavuot, whose meals are characterized by the season's traditional bounty of milk and the wheat harvest, you'll learn how to make fresh homemade cheeses, creamy blintzes, cheese bourekas, Sweet Noodle Kugel, Biblical Cream Cheese and an unusual Halvah Cheesecake. There are also many interesting combinations for unusual salads.

Here are some dairy-good dishes to serve for your Shavuot celebration, Mother's Day brunch or any special occasion. Enjoy.

BIBLICAL CREAM CHEESE

Long before the advent of bagels and lox, goat or sheep cream cheese was part of our ancestors' diet. Prepared soft, it could be used as a spread or as a first course for dipping in bread. Allowed to drain slightly longer, it could dry out sufficiently to be made into balls and covered in olive oil and herbs for extended storage. Here is a superb substitution for regular cream cheese in any recipe. Use full-fat sour cream that does not contain stabilizers – available in Persian or Middle Eastern stores.

4 cups (2 pints) dairy sour cream
½ tsp. salt (optional)
cheesecloth or muslin bag

Line a strainer or colander with a double layer of cheesecloth and place over a bowl. Pour the sour cream and salt into the strainer and allow to drain for 1 hour. Gather up the edges of the cheesecloth and tie them, lightly squeezing out as much moisture as possible.

Hang the bag over the kitchen sink and leave for several hours or overnight. For a softer-spreading cheese, check after 3 to 4 hours. Refrigerate when the desired consistency is reached. Makes 3¼ cups.

LISHANSKY'S FAMOUS HALVAH CHEESECAKE

Veteran cookbook author and maker of liqueurs and jams out of every conceivable fruit, herb and vegetable, Ya'acov Lishansky, who recently passed away in his 90s, was the first (and only) Israeli man to win first prize at the "Queen of the Kitchen" cooking contest. This recipe is adapted from one of his.

Crust:
1 cup unbleached all-purpose flour
⅓ cup sugar
1 egg yolk
1 tsp. freshly grated lemon zest
¼ cup (½ stick) butter, melted
¼ tsp. vanilla extract
Cold water

Filling:
2½ pounds cream cheese, at room temperature
1¼ cups sugar
1 cup mashed vanilla halvah
3 tbsp. all-purpose flour
¼ tsp. vanilla extract
6 eggs
¼ cup heavy cream

Preheat oven to 400. Prepare a 9 or 10-inch springform pan by cutting a circle of parchment paper to line the bottom. (The 9-inch pan will result in a higher cake.) Affix to the bottom with a little butter or non-stick cooking spray. Cut a 3-inch-wide strip of parchment paper and affix to the sides of the pan.

Mix flour and sugar in a medium bowl. Beat egg yolk, lemon zest, melted butter and vanilla together with a fork. Make a well in the flour mixture and pour in the liquids, then stir the mixture with a fork, adding just enough cold water to form a ball.

Transfer to a lightly floured surface and roll out to ⅛-inch thickness to fit the bottom and side of the prepared pan. (The dough does not have to come all the way up the sides.) Prick the bottom and sides with a fork, or add pie weights or dry beans placed on a circle of parchment paper and bake for 15 to 20 minutes, until lightly browned. Remove and let cool.

Increase oven temperature to 500. In the bowl of a standing electric mixer, beat the cream cheese, sugar, halvah, flour and vanilla together until smooth. Add eggs one at a time, blending lightly after each addition, and pour in the cream. Do not overbeat or the cake will crack in the centre while baking. Pour filling into baked crust.

Bake for 12 to 15 minutes. Turn heat down to 200 and bake 60 to 90 minutes, until a toothpick comes out clean and only slightly moist.

Let stand in the oven with the oven door partially open for 1 hour. Remove and let cool completely; chill until firm. Cover with plastic wrap after the top has firmed, and refrigerate at least 4 hours or overnight. Serves 12 to 14.

Amid mourning, Likud Party rejects Sharon's plan

By DINA KRAFT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — On its own, the murder of a pregnant Israeli woman and her four daughters in Gaza would be considered a tragedy.

But the fact that the roadside slaying of Tali Hatuel and her young daughters took place on Sunday, the same day the Likud party voted against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan for a unilateral withdrawal from the Gaza Strip, also gave the killings a painful irony.

The vote dealt a political defeat to Sharon, who had championed the withdrawal plan as the right thing for Israel's security.

Likud members who voted in the referendum disagreed. Of those who turned up at the polls – fewer than half of Likud's 193,000 eligible voters – roughly 60 per cent voted against the plan and about 40 per cent in favour, according to preliminary results.

"I think this is a bad day for the country," Israel's absorption minister Tzipi Livni said after the vote.

Livni was among the cabinet ministers who backed the plan calling for a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and parts of the northern West Bank, including the dismantling of Jewish settlements in those areas.

"It indicates that Likud members are against any concessions, and this threatens to make the party irrelevant," Livni said.

But in Gush Katif, the largest Israeli settlement bloc in Gaza, there was some relief.

"Now the plan has to be stopped," said Ezra Eldad, who lives in the Gaza settlement of Ganei Tal. "We have won the struggle."

Any sense of triumph, however, was tempered by grief at news of the shooting Sunday that left five of Gaza's Jewish residents dead.

Hatuel, 34, who was eight months pregnant, was driving with her four daughters down the main road that connects Gush Katif and a main Gaza border crossing when her station-wagon was fired at by Palestinian gunmen in a nearby car.

Thousands of mourners attend the funeral of Tali Hatuel and her four daughters. [Isranet photo]

The hail of bullets forced the vehicle off the road, and the two terrorists approached the car and fired at the family. Hatuel and her four daughters – Hila, 11, Hadar, 9, Roni, 7, and Merav, 2 – were killed immediately.

The two gunmen were killed soon afterward by Israeli troops, the Israeli army said.

Hatuel was believed to be on her way to protest Sharon's withdrawal plan.

A blood-soaked baby seat and children's books were found in the car, which displayed a bumper sticker reading, "Uprooting the settlements, victory for terror."

The five were buried Sunday night in a funeral attended by thousands. David Hatuel stood over the bodies of his wife and daughters, sobbing. He had been away from home a lot in recent weeks, helping campaign against Sharon's pullout plan.

Lower taxes approved

The cabinet has approved Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's tax cuts for medium and low income earners, and the reduction in corporate tax of one percentage point to a new level of 35 per cent. The corporate tax cut is effective retroactive to the start of 2004.

Annan criticizes Arafat

United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan last week urged Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat to give the Gaza disengagement plan a chance, saying Palestinians should crack down on militant violence to help revive a broader peace effort. In unusually tough language, Annan – in a letter obtained by Reuters – also criticized Arafat for failing to meet obligations under the U.S.- and UN-backed "road map" peace plan, such as implementing security reforms and ending suicide bombings.

Army apologizes for killing

Israel apologized for killing a Palestinian academic during a counterterrorist raid. Yasser Abu Leimun, who lectured on insurance administration at two West Bank universities, was shot dead in his home last week at Tallouza, outside Nablus, as Israeli troops battled Hamas gunmen nearby. On Thursday, the Israeli army admitted Leimun was killed by accident.

Jews remember Wingate

About 800 people last week commemorated the British World War I general who helped shape the precursor to the Israeli army. The ceremony at Arlington National Cemetery in Washington, D.C., where Orde Wingate is buried, drew dignitaries and Jewish leaders and marked the 60th anniversary of the general's death. Wingate, who became a fervent Zionist during his time in pre-state Palestine, died leading a U.S.-British force in Burma. He is widely credited for making the Haganah an effective fighting army. Paul Bernstein, the Jewish War Veterans' national commander, said Wingate "gave Israel the tactics to fight five Arab countries at once."

Chess players to Libya?

Libya has invited Israel's chess team to participate in the World Chess Championship in Tripoli. Following talks with World Chess Federation officials, who insisted that Israel be allowed to participate, Libyan leader Muammar Gadhafi's son Saif Al-Islam welcomed any player who wishes to participate in the June 18 to July 13 competition.

Nuclear watchdog to Israel

The United Nations' chief nuclear watchdog is expected to visit Israel. Officials would not discuss the agenda for the July visit by Mohamed ElBaradei, head of the International Atomic Energy Agency, calling it routine.

Political impact of referendum not clear

Two soldiers and an Israeli civilian were also wounded in the incident.

Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Popular Resistance Committees claimed joint responsibility for the attack, saying it was carried out to avenge Israel's recent assassinations of Hamas leaders Sheik Ahmed Yassin and Abdel Aziz Rantissi.

Later Sunday, Israel launched a counterattack, with a helicopter strike against a Hamas-aligned radio station in Gaza.

It was not immediately clear if the Palestinian attack influenced Likud party voting either way. Many observers predicted in recent days that support for the plan had dwindled, with opponents gradually gaining a majority.

The margin of defeat for Sharon's plan in voting Sunday was larger than polls had predicted the weekend before the referendum.

The campaign against the plan had been fierce. At the sprawling plaza outside the convention centre in Jerusalem where some Likud members cast their ballots, banners were strung between trees warning that approval of the plan amounted to a "prize for terrorism." Teenagers also distributed bumper stickers and pamphlets opposing the plan.

Rami Shalom, a 75-year-old retiree, was among the few voters at the convention centre who openly said he supported the plan.

"We cannot drag this out forever," he said, referring to Israel's occupation of Gaza. "It is a difficult situation and it will not be easy to dismantle settlements, but it looks as if there is no choice."

Opponents of the plan took pains to say they were voting not against Sharon, but against his withdrawal plan.

Sharon had hoped to clinch support for the plan after U.S. President George W. Bush endorsed it last month. Bush also said that Israel had the right to retain some West Bank land in a future peace deal and that Palestinian refugees from Israel's 1948 War of Independence should not be granted the right to return to their former homes inside Israel. Instead, they can live in a future Palestinian state, Bush said.

Sharon had warned Likud members in recent days that a vote against his plan might lead to the end of his government.

As voters headed to polls, he said the vote would determine the direction in which Israel was headed.

"This is a fateful decision, tough but the most important. It will determine whether Israel will move forward in all areas – in security, in the economy, in education, in industry, in our relations with the United States – or move backward," Sharon said at a cabinet meeting Sunday. "And each person must think good and well about the future of his children and his own future, and vote for my plan."

But after the vote, it was unclear what impact the non-binding referendum would have on Sharon's plan, the Likud party or the prime minister's political future.

Aides indicated that one thing was certain: Sharon would not resign.

Alfred E. Mann announces Intention to Commit $100 Million to the Technion

Biomedical industry entrepreneur, innovative scientist and noted philanthropist Alfred E. Mann has announced his intention to commit $100 million to the American Technion Society (ATS) in furtherance of his plan to establish the Alfred Mann Institute (AMI) for Biomedical Engineering at the Technion - Israel Institute of Technology.

Initially, the institute would be dedicated to the development of medical devices and processes to improve human health and well being. This would make the Technion the first university outside of the United States selected by Mann to be a part of his vision of establishing institutes at the world's top research centers (the first AMI was established at the University of Southern California, and affiliated institutes are planned to be formed at UCLA, Johns Hopkins University and others). The $100 million will also be the largest philanthropic commitment ever to an Israeli institution.

Mann said the Technion's standing as a world leader in scientific research and its high academic ranking played significant roles in his decision. "The Technion is a world-class research university characterized by excellence, passion and brainpower that is as good as any on the planet," he said.

Moreover, he pointed out that the interdisciplinary nature of the university and the presence of a medical school will be an advantage to the AMI institute, which is based on the melding of science, medicine and engineering.

"There is so much cross fertilization at the Technion among inventive minds in medicine, engineering, chemistry and biology, that success can be the only result," Mann said.

Because he is a prolific scientist who has launched scores of successful products and companies dedicated to combating multiple diseases, as well as a pragmatic visionary, Mann's faith in the Technion is especially gratifying, said Technion President Yitzhak Apeloig. "All of Israel will be very proud to have the AMI at the Technion," he added.

Alfred E. Mann is chairman and co-CEO of Advanced Bionics Corporation (ABC) since 1994. ABC is a manufacturer and distributor of cochlear implants for the restoration of hearing and is introducing a broad range of neurstimulation systems. He also serves as Chairman of the Board and CEO of MannKind Corporation, a diversified biopharmaceutical company focused on the development of novel therapeutics and drug delivery technologies for diabetes, cancer and inflammatory and autoimmune diseases.

These medications are attached to the ends of the DNA molecules that make up the computer and are released by activating the relevant enzyme.

Since the diagnosis is not always clear-cut, the computer has instructions to release the medication only if the certainty of the diagnosis is above a predetermined level.

Though each molecular computer can only test for one type of disease, millions of such computers can be contained in a single drop of solution, Shapiro noted.

However, he warned, the prototype computer he and his colleagues designed is still far from being ready for use. Their product, he said, was built and tested on a solution that contains no proteins, fats or sugars – materials that occur in every living organism and that could both interfere with the working of the computer and be damaged by the computer.

It will take many years, perhaps even decades, of additional work before the computer is adapted to be able to function in a living environment, Shapiro said.

In addition to Shapiro, the other members of the research team were Dr. Rivka Adar and graduate students Yaakov Benenson, Binyamin Gil and Uri Ben-Dor.

Will expanded EU be more pro-Israel?

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — With the European Union often at odds with Jewish groups over its opposition to Israeli policy, hopes were raised last year when a number of key eastern European countries defied most of their future EU partners to fall in line with the United States on Iraq.

That led Jewish leaders to believe many of the new states would act as a counterbalance to current EU policy, which is often seen as highly critical of Israel.

But as 10 new countries entered the union May 1, some European Jewish leaders and Israeli officials are reassessing their predictions.

"At the moment, we have to persuade 15 countries" to support issues of concern to European Jews, "so it's not going to be easier to persuade 25," said Maram Stern of the World Jewish Congress (WJC) office in Brussels.

That said, certain key countries in eastern Europe have tended to be less critical of Israel. Anti-Israel rhetoric in the media, generally widespread in western Europe, has been far less prevalent in the east.

But it's not clear if the eastern European countries joining the union can influence their western European partners to adopt more favourable positions toward Israel. In fact, things could just as well go the other way, said Lawrence Weinbaum, who analyzes trends in the former eastern bloc for WJC.

"As they come more under the influence of other European countries in Brussels, they may move closer to traditional EU positions on Israel," Weinbaum said.

What might change, Polish Jewish writer Konstanty Gebert told JTA, "is the relatively more balanced approach that some new members, especially Poland, have taken on the Middle East conflict. As the EU attempts to integrate the foreign policies of its members, it can be expected that the newcomers will more closely toe Brussels' line, which is markedly critical of Israel."

The entry of 10 new countries into the union cements the process begun with the fall of the Communist bloc in the early 1990s and unites the economically weaker eastern countries with the world's largest trading bloc.

Israeli diplomats in Europe said the new countries' entry won't produce a major change in European policy on the Middle East.

"There are sociological trends at work here," said Haim Assraf, a senior official at Israel's EU mission in Brussels. "They recognize they're the new boys, so they'll look to integrate into the EU by following a consensus line."

In the short term, at least, that won't improve Israel's diplomatic position, Assraf said, because the consensus would now be presented by a more powerful bloc of 25 states.

Much also will depend upon proposed amendments to a future EU constitution, particularly the abolition of individual states' veto over EU decisions, he said.

A change to majority voting would likely ensure backing for traditional EU foreign policy positions, which have been perceived by Israel's supporters and European Jewish groups as hostile to the Jewish state.

Most notably, the EU has expressed fierce criticism of Israel's West Bank security fence and its assassination of Palestinian terrorist leaders. Most recently, Europe gave a cool response to U.S. President George W. Bush's support for Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan to withdraw from the Gaza Strip.

European economic analysts note that it will likely take some time before the new states feel comfortable enough to take independent foreign policy positions.

In addition, many of the new states undoubtedly will be more concerned at first with improving their standards of living than in engaging in major foreign policy initiatives.

For example, the European Central Bank said two weeks ago that Poland – by far the largest of the 10 new states – may need 40 years to reach the economic development of current EU members. Even countries such as Hungary and the Czech Republic could need more than a decade to catch up.

Currently, all the new members run trade deficits, while most of their trade is with current EU member states.

While general policy would still be formulated by the European Commission – the EU's executive branch – the composition of the European Parliament, where elections are scheduled for the middle of June, remains a problem for Israel's supporters in Europe.

The European Parliament has been the most problematic legislature for Israel among democratic states, Assraf said, adding that it was difficult to see how it would change with input from the new countries.

But Serge Cwajgenbaum, secretary-general of the European Jewish Congress, said he saw more positive signs from European Socialist parties in eastern Europe, particularly in Hungary and Poland.

As the principal opposition bloc in the European Parliament, the Party of European Socialists has been at the centre of much of the legislature's anti-Israel rhetoric.

But polls suggesting the center-right bloc of European Democrats will increase its majority in the Parliament offer more promising signs for Israel.

"There are many paradoxes with the entry of the new countries. Some of them have a more balanced approach to Israel, but there are also some strong nationalist elements there," Cwajgenbaum said.

Weinbaum agreed, pointing out that anti-Semitic rhetoric was still strong in certain countries such as Hungary, while other states maintained certain ambiguities in relation to the Holocaust.

"We see countries where local populations had a direct hand in the Shoah deliberately attempting to whitewash the past," he said. "In the Baltic states, for example, the Jews are seen as having a hand in the Communist rule" of the former Soviet Union.

In fact, far-right groupings already are looking to form their own inter-European partnerships. Jean-Marie Le Pen, leader of France's National Front party, attended a recent nationalist rally in Budapest and two weeks ago helped kick-start the European election campaign of the neo-Nazi British National Party.

Threats from far-right groupings – which base much of their political platform on strong opposition to EU integration – could grow if the new entrants fail to achieve rapid economic growth in the EU.

"There are going to be winners and losers from EU enlargement," Weinbaum said. "Faced with economic hardship and higher prices in the short-term, the losers could be attracted to the nationalist camp."

Nevertheless, positions in the east on Israel generally are far more promising than in the west.

"For obvious historical reasons, U.S. influence is very strong in the east, so the general view is that it can't be any worse for us," Weinbaum said.

Canadian family inaugurates Israeli Holocaust education centre

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Since its inception in 1972, Toronto-based businessman and philanthropist Alex Grossman has contributed millions of dollars toward the development of the Massuah Institute for the Study of the Holocaust at Kibbutz Tel Itzhak.

The 85-year-old Polish Holocaust survivor's latest million-dollar contribution, which has enabled Massuah to establish the Grossman School International Center for Holocaust Studies, was recognized at a ceremony last month on the eve of Holocaust Memorial Day, when in view of his inability to make the trip to Israel himself, Alex's son George along with wife Kitty, daughter Lisa and nephew Yoram, gathered for the official inauguration of the new school.

"I'm honoured to be here today because I am here to represent our family, not only to open up the dedication, but to carry on the work that my father started and that should be continued," George told a crowd of survivors and dignitaries, among them former Tel Aviv Mayor Shlomo Lahat.

"Over 35 years ago, a light went on for my father, Alex Grossman. The time had come to shed the darkness of the Holocaust. No longer were the secrets and truths of the Holocaust to be kept hidden from the next generation," George said. "The torch must be passed and the young must be shown the light, and I am proud to be the one to carry on my family's tradition."

George's presence at the ceremony encapsulated his message about the importance of Holocaust remembrance.

"As the Holocaust survivors are aging and the generation is passing on, it is necessary for the second generation to make a conscious effort to educate our children in order to ensure that the youth of this generation and the next and the next know the communities that formed their roots; the naked truths of the Nazi's plans; and the stories of those who lived and the millions that perished," said George, who offered the example of Remembrance Day in Canada.

"Although the children in Canada wear the poppies, they know almost nothing about World War I," he said, adding that the history of the Holocaust is even more fragile, since it's often not specifically taught in Canadian schools.

"I don't think we want to have our Jewish children not know anything about the Holocaust," he said.

"More and more, we see the second generation taking on the commitment of remembrance and education from the first generation," added Massuah director Aya Ben-Naftali. "George is a very good example of this. He is carrying on his father's legacy, with a firm belief in the fact that Massuah has a unique vision."

He said Massuah is an international Holocaust teaching institute for both students and educators from around the world that regards educational activity as the most meaningful way to commemorate the Holocaust and its victims.

"We promote an informal, value-oriented kind of education," explained Ben-Naftali, saying courses use interdisciplinary materials such as literature, art, history, psychology and computers in order to be as accessible as possible to youth.

"Students look into the Holocaust, then look into their own day-to-day lives to see the connection between the moral problems raised by the Holocaust and the relevance of those problems to their contemporary lives."

Alex Grossman

Alex Grossman, who moved to Toronto from Belgium in 1950 along with his wife Genia, escaped from Krakow, Poland, to Austria and then to Hungary and finally to Belgium. Unlike their entire immediate families who perished in Nazi death camps, Alex and Genia survived. They were expecting George, their second child, when they moved to North America.

After arriving in Canada, Alex started Belmont Construction with partners Abe Bleeman and the late Joe Silver. The company went on to become a major land developer in Toronto. Now president of Grossman Holdings, as well as chairman of Pinedale Properties and the director of Egis Holdings and Primegg, Alex has devoted much of his time and earnings to Jewish causes in both Canada and Israel.

He contributed $1 million (Cdn) to complete Massuah's new campus in 1990, and last year he moved on to his next million-dollar project, "Six Million Accusers: The State of Israel vs. Adolf Eichmann," Massuah's main historical museum exhibit.

"It's not an ordinary museum, but a kind of interactive educational one," said Ben-Naftali, explaining that students who visit the pavilion are able to re-enact part of the trial in a three-dimensional courtroom.

The Eichmann exhibit "cannot help but have a profound impact on all who touch it," George said.

"It is a crowning achievement of the union between technology and the human soul. It is an educational tool that leaves an indelible imprint."

But the new Grossman School International Center for Holocaust Studies, which includes a new seminar centre and specialized workshop areas, is the Grossman family's largest project to date.

Since its inauguration, Massuah teaching professionals have been able to offer classes to three times as many students as before and to expand the curriculum to include a total of more than 28,000 seminars.

"Massuah is destined for new advances. Its mission should be to continue to proceed to the forefront of Holocaust education. Let its fine work continue for generations to come," George told the ceremony. "And let the Grossman School International Center for Holocaust Studies represent a recognition of past accomplishments and a step toward the future."

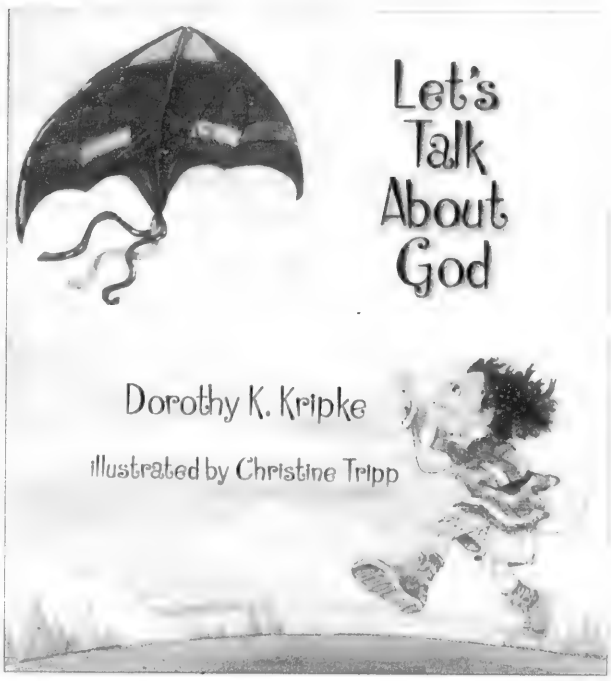
'God is the good that's in the world,' author says

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter



Do you ever wonder what God is like? Why can't we see Him? How does He talk to us, and can we talk to Him?

I have a surprise for you. Most people have questions like that, even adults.

A good way to get answers to at least some of the questions we have is in a terrific book, Let's Talk About God, by Dorothy Kripke, with illustrations by Christine Tripp (Alef Design Group, 2003, originally published 1953).

Kripke tries to answer some of the questions we ask about God. First, she writes a poem that talks about what God is: "God is not a person,.../ God is the good that's in the world/ And God is only One./ God is the good that's in the world/ And God made everything."

Kripke explains that God has many names. One of the main things we call Him is a parent. "Just as your parents love you and take care of you and help you, God loves all the people in the world," she writes.

When God made the world, the sky, the grass, the sun and the moon and all the animals, He made people too. He "put a little piece of God into people, to make them special and different from all other living things," and when He rested after making the world, he decided that people should rest too – and that's why we have Shabbat, "a special day for rest and prayer and fun with family and friends."

God is so wonderful, Kripke says, that He is everywhere in the world all the time, inside and outside, and inside everyone.

We know we can't see God the way we see the wind and the leaves, the author says, but we can see what He does – like giving us food, sleep, teachers, friends, puppies, butterflies, rainbows and the sound of rain. He heals us when we are sick, gives us courage and special gifts so that we can enjoy the world and make it a better and happier place.

God gave us the Ten Commandments and the Bible, which teach us how to be good, Kripke says. He wants us to be kind and loving, as He is.

But He doesn't force us to be good. He says, "You must choose for yourself. If you choose to be good, you will be a little like Me, and you will be happy."

You may think that if you make a mistake or do something wrong, God won't love you anymore. But that's wrong, Kripke says in her book. If we are sorry and make amends, then He forgives us. "God knows that no one is perfect."

Kripke teaches us that God is perfect: He can do everything, He never sleeps, and He never changes,

At the end, she says something that may surprise you. Adults sometimes act as if they know everything. But she says there are many things about God that we don't know and many questions even parents, teachers and rabbis can't answer.

What we do know is how He wants us to live, because the Torah tells us. "The bit of God inside each one of us tells us too."

This is a book you will enjoy talking to your parents and your teachers about.

Think working out is hard? Try it at 92

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Champion athlete Harry Kay drives his car to work every day. He goes to the Bathurst JCC several times a week. And he has an exceptional memory.

There's nothing unusual about that, except for the fact Kay is 92 years old. He still works as a paralegal for Goodman and Griffin in Mississauga, discharging mortgages, searching titles and registering house sales. And while he travels all over Ontario, he doesn't have to race around as much as he used to.

"With technology, many things are done right in the office," he says.

Kay, who lives alone in north Toronto, spoke to The CJN about his youth, his physical activities, his marriage and his happiness at having lived so long.

In the early 1920s, when Kay was seven years old, he sold newspapers at the corner of Temperance and Yonge streets.

Many things have changed since his childhood in Toronto, he said, but "one thing hasn't changed and that is anti-Semitism.

"I can look back to the time when you couldn't walk across Queen and Spadina without having someone getting the Jewish boys into a fight. After all these years, I can't believe it is still here."

Kay attended the Central High School of Commerce and later owned and operated two car washes. He had an outstanding athletic career and performed exceptionally well in all forms of mathematics.

Among his many framed certificates of his accomplishments is a recent award of recognition for 20 years of employment from Goodman and Griffin and a booklet prepared by his children, Bernard and Shayla Kay and Barbara and Jack Goodman, and his four grandchildren noting their love and respect for his many achievements.

Harry Kay, 92, with Mel Katzman, the son of Manny Katzman who played on the city championship Beaches Softball League with him 60 years ago.

volleyball teams show a young Harry (then Kaminsky) proudly wearing his team insignias: the Canadian Air Force, Bellwoods Park, the YMHA, the Canada Laundry Jewish Community Softball League and others. He was a pitcher for the St. Georges Junior Hardball Team when they won the Ontario championships and was a first baseman with Tri-Bell when they played in the softball world championships (though they didn't win).

"I think I played in every ball park in Toronto and in most parks in Ontario," Kay said, adding that he can still recall many of the games and his teammates.

During World War II, Kay served in the Canadian Air Force and after his discharge, he met Phyllis Nidelman of Owen Sound. They married in 1947.

"She was 20 and I was 36," he said, and joked, "I thought that if I married a younger person, I would have someone to look after me in my old age. You never know."

Kay said sadly that his wife, who has Alzheimer's, has been living at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care for six years.

"I spend many evenings and most weekends with [her]," he said.

Along with his ongoing physical activities, Kay often demonstrates his mathematical prowess to schoolchildren. He invites others to compete against him in adding, subtracting and multiplying.

"When I went to school, I always got 100 [per cent] in mathematics. And today my mind is still so clear. I can challenge anyone when doing mathematics. No one adds or multiplies as fast as I can."

His greatest asset in his long life has been his sense of humour, he said.

"People stop me on the street and ask me to tell them a joke or two. And I take every day as it comes. I feel blessed that I have lived this long."

Besides humour, he said, people need to exercise, avoid overeating and "do mentally stimulating things every day such as crossword puzzles, read Time magazine and the newspapers."

Kay, who does all that, added one more thing: "When I can't sleep, I do mathematical problems in my mind."

Toronto Jewish Film Festival features eclectic mix of movies

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Below are previews of a selection of films that will be screened as part of the annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which runs until May 9.

Janet Rosenberg Jagan is an unlikely revolutionary – a Jewish grandmother. In 1997, when she was 77 years old, she was elected president of multiracial Guyana, formerly British Guyana. "Bubbe of Guyana," one newspaper headline blared.

The life and times of this unusual and extraordinary woman unfolds in Suzanne Wasserman's feisty film, Thunder in Guyana (May 9 at 1 p.m. at the Bloor Cinema). Born in Chicago and raised in a staunchly conservative, middle-class family, she broke the mould when she married Cheddi Jagan, an East Indian from British Guyana who had been studying medicine at Wayne State University. Fervent Marxists, they organized sugar workers and worked tirelessly for Guyanese independence.

When Jagan's husband won the presidency, she served in his cabinet and was speaker of parliament. When he was deposed by the British, they were both arrested. Returning to office, they drew the wrath of Britain and the United States. After a long period in opposition, Jagan stormed back to power in 1992, only to die of a heart attack five years later. Dubbed the "mother of the nation" in the wake of her 1997 victory, she was forced to bow out after only 20 months in office. Thunder in Guyana is an empathetic portrait of a driven, committed and supremely self-confident woman.

Moisey (Mikhail) Kaufman was a renowned figure in the Soviet film industry. Dziga and his Brothers airs May 9th.

Bernd Fischer's From Dachau with Love (May 7 at 12 p.m. at Miles Nadal JCC) paints a vivid picture of a pretty Bavarian town weighed down by the burden of Germany's Nazi past. Fischer, who grew up there, successfully conveys the moral ambivalency that Dachau – the site of a concentration camp – must grapple with almost six decades after the defeat of the Third Reich.

On the face of it, Dachau, known for its Renaissance castle and a school of painting, is a perfectly normal place. But who can forget that 31,000 people, many of them Jews, were killed in the camp that bears its name? Dachau's notorious association with this Nazi killing ground is such that some of its 39,000 inhabitants still feel a deep sense of shame and pass themselves off as residents of a different town when travelling abroad.

Fischer's complex but accessible film introduces us to three types of Germans: those who keep faith with Dachau's past, those who blithely ignore it and regard Dachau solely as a tourist destination, and those who wish to capitalize on its notoriety.

The central figure in the movie is Max Mannheimer, a chatty Holocaust survivor who conducts tours of the camp and maintains friendly relations with a Carmelite nun whose convent rubs up against its outer wall.

Professor Mamlock (May 7 at 11 a.m. at the Bloor Cinema) was one of the first German films to deal with the persecution of Jews during the Nazi period. It was made in 1961 in what was east Germany, and is based on a 1933 play by Friedrich Wolf that the Nazis censored. Wolf's son, Konrad, directed this fine film, which revolves around a principled Jewish physician and decorated war veteran who is blind to the terrible realities overtaking Germany.

Mamlock, chief of surgery in a Berlin university hospital, inhabits a pure and rational world of science, enlightenment and German opera. He ignores the writing on the wall – the increasingly bitter political debates in his own hospital, the warning by a sympathetic colleague that fascism is on the rise, the street clashes pitting Nazis against Communists. Mamlock believes that Adolf Hitler is a passing phenomenon. His Christian wife is just as complacent.

When Jews are denied employment in public institutions, Mamlock protests. "We're Germans!" he exclaims. As the situation deteriorates, his daughter, Ruth, is humiliated by Nazis. Soon enough, Mamlock is ignominiously led away from the hospital, the word "Jude" scrawled on his white smock. As a war vet, Mamlock is granted permission to continue working in the hospital, but his unswerving principles forbid him to accept this exemption. Though somewhat didactic, Professor Mamlock is a graphic, deeply-felt film.

Rose's Songs (May 9 at 2 p.m. at Miles Nadal JCC), set in 1944 during the Holocaust in Hungary, is a co-Hungarian-Italian production. The Halasz family, having lost their livelihood, finds refuge in the walled villa of a famous singer. Every night, she serenades them and other Jews with operatic arias that perk up their sagging spirits. But the walls are closing in. On a tram in Budapest, Geza Halasz and his son are insulted by an anti-Semite. Then a gentile neighbour forbids his boy to play with Halasz's son. "Are Jews not Hungarians?" his son asks plaintively. "It's not so simple," Halasz replies in anguish.

Through bluff and bravado, Halasz manages to keep his family safe from harm. But the pressure they are under is such that his daughter says, "I don't want to be a Jew anymore."

Rose's Songs tries to portray the persecution of Jews in Hungary realistically. But its verisimilitude is shaken by a scene in which an observant Jew, his head covered by a yarmulke, asks his daughter for bacon.

* * *

The Kaufman brothers were a formidable force in Soviet cinema. David, known as Dziga Vertov, was a master documentarian. His brother, Moisey (Mikhail), worked with him before striking out on his own. Together, they made the first animated movie in the former Soviet Union (FSU) and also filmed Lenin's funeral. Later, they glorified the FSU's campaign of industrialization. Boris, the third brother, found work in France and Canada before immigrating to the United States. There he struggled to gain recognition. Eventually, he succeeded as a cinematographer and director, working with actors such as Marlon Brando, Ingrid Bergman and Henry Fonda. Dziga and his Brothers (May 9 at 12 p.m. at Miles Nadal JCC), a fascinating Russian documentary by Yevgeni Tsymbal, traces the brothers' careers in the FSU, France and Hollywood.

* * *

Seekers of Happiness (May 6 at 4 p.m. at Miles Nadal JCC), a 1936 Soviet production directed by Vladimir Korsh-Sablin, glorifies Birobidzhan, the pallid Soviet Jewish Autonomous Republic in the wastes of Asiatic Russia. The film, which turns on a proletarian Jewish family planting roots in a faraway land, looks and sounds like a quaint, naive relic from a distant era.

* * *

Purim Safari: Frederic Brenner's Journey Amongst the Jews of South Africa (May 8 at 11.45 p.m., Bloor Cinema) is quirky but unsatisfying. Brenner, a French photographer, proceeds from the fallacious assumption that the margin defines the mainstream. He profiles an ostrich farmer, a transvestite performer and a woman who operates a soup kitchen in a black township. His portraits, though interesting, are beside the point because Brenner misses the real story: South Africa's evolving Jewish community as it adjusts to a new political order after apartheid.

MAINTAINING A PROUD TRADITION, TORONTO JEWISH FOLK CHOIR PRESENTS 78TH ANNUAL SPRING CONCERT

Few local traditions within Toronto's Jewish community have persisted as long as the Toronto Jewish Folk Choir's annual spring concert, which enters its 78th season this month.

Toronto Jewish Folk Choir

This year, the choir is adding the infectious klezmer sounds of Beyond the Pale to the bill. The talent roster also includes conductor Alexander Veprinsky, soloists Miriam Eskin, Mark Fox and Herman Rombouts, and pianist Lina Zemelman.

The program features an eclectic mix of songs on Jewish themes, in Yiddish, Hebrew, Judeo-Spanish, Russian and English. The highlight is the choral ballade Benyomin der driter (Benjamin the Third) by Max Helfman (1901-1963), a musical adaptation of the classic novel by Mendele Moikher Sforim.

The concert is dedicated to the memory of three people associated with the choir: "Canada's music man" Nicholas Goldschmidt, longtime Toronto Symphony Orchestra cellist Robert Spergel and longtime chorister Bella Shek. All died in February – Shek at the age of almost 103.

Lawrence Park Collegiate, Lawrence Ave. W., east of Avenue Road. Limited free parking at the school. Tickets ($22 and $18; children under 12 free) are available at Jewish bookstores or at the door. Sunday, May 16, 3 p.m. 416-489-7681. www.winchevskycentre.ort/choir html.

Names in the News: Toronto jazz vocalist Beverly Taft launches her new CD, How Ya Gonna Keep 'Em Down on the Farm? at the Montreal Bistro, 65 Sherbourne St., Monday, May 10. Sets are at 9 and 10:45 p.m. and the cover is $10. Reservations, 416-363-0179… The Ron Davis Trio is also celebrating the release of a new CD, Mungle Music, at the Montreal Bistro next week. Fresh from a successful Japanese tour, the trio is at the venerable jazz spot May 11 to 15 (www.rddavis.com)… Singer Janis Orenstein and musicians Aydin Sencan, Agah Ecevit, Gurani Koc and Ben Grossman present Ashki's Divan, a concert of traditional Sufi music from Turkey: all are members of the Halveti-Jerrahi Order of Dervishes. They perform at the Music Gallery, 197 John St. (416-204-1080) on May 9, 3 p.m. Tickets range from $5 to $15… A new mural by Ian Leventhal was unveiled recently on the front of the office building at 111 Peter St. Commissioned by the owners, the Dan family of Toronto, the mural offers a colourful reflection of the street life as well as a "vivid, dynamic optimism that reflects the district," Leventhal remarked.

Capsule Review: Cookin' at the Cookery, the electrifying tribute to jazz and blues great Alberta Hunter, features a rousing, soulful Jackie Richardson whose voice captures the best of Aretha Franklin and Bessie Smith (if not necessarily Alberta Hunter). The second great surprise is that the show's other half, Montego Glover, also offers great singing and a vibrant performance. For fans of classic blues and jazz, Cookin' at the Cookery continues through May at the New Yorker Theatre, 651 Yonge St. 416-872-1111.

Exhibit captures Spain's golden era for Jews

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Toronto-based art photographer, Orah Buck, who has a keen interest in Jewish history, is presenting an exhibit titled "The Golden Reign of Spain," with poetry by Spanish Jewish poets of the Middle Ages, at the ARTA Gallery in The Distillery district until May 14.

Buck, who has held exhibitions of her photographs in Canada, the United States and Israel, has created a unique work by teaming the poetry of prominent Spanish Jews of the Middle Ages (circa 900 to 1250 CE) with images from the National Library in Madrid, the Barcelona Rare Books Library (Biblioteca de Catalunya) and areas of historical relevance to Spanish Jews.

The exhibit features 36, 24 by 24 inch digitalized colour images. Many are from illuminated manuscripts of the Biblia Hebrea 1470, the Jewish astronomer of King Alphonso, and the Barcelona Haggadah.

Buck says the images cover several millennia, from biblical times to the Middle Ages.

"From a technical perspective, pre-Gutenburg illuminated manuscripts have been enhanced by today's latest digital process. Selected images are adorned with gold leaf to replicate the technique of medieval times."

She says that when you combine the images with verse, they become even more meaningful.

A portion of the Barcelona Haggadah photographed by art photographer Orah Buck, in the Barcelona Rare Books Library (Biblioteca de Catalunya)

Buck was born in Cincinnati and emigrated to Toronto in 1951 when she married Adam Buck. She taught high school and turned to photography, her first love, two decades ago. Since than, she has had extensive exhibits at Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and a permanent display at Tel Hashomer Hospital in Israel.

Her photographs titled "Babatha's Story" were exhibited at Beth Tzedec Congregation's Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum for four months before moving to the library of the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York.

"I was inspired to create 'The Golden Reign of Spain' 15 years ago when I discovered a small Penguin paperback in my late mother Rachel's effects. The book featured English translations of the works of the Hebrew poets of Spain."

Although the book was literally falling apart and held together with rubber bands, Buck says, "Its contents made a lasting impression on me.

"Most intriguing to me is the miracle of today's digital technology that enables me to select each unique negative, enhance key patterns and colours that have faded over time to produce an image as it must have appeared in centuries past."

She says the technology "has allowed me to photograph the pre-Gutenburg illuminated pages of the Bible, handwritten in 1470 CE, as well as the astronomy tablets which probably guided Christopher Columbus and other explorers to the New World, and the Barcelona Haggadah, with its beautiful, emotive, heart-warming illuminations."

The ARTA Gallery in The Distillery district is located at 55 Mill. St., Building 9, Suite 102. For details, call 416-364-2782, or see www.orahbuck photo.com.

Photos of Canadian literary giants sat unseen for 35 years

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

In the summer of 1970, Sheldon (Shelly) Grimson, a budding photojournalist, was given a plum assignment. He was invited to photograph 13 of the country's leading poets, among them, literary giants such as Margaret Atwood, Michael Ondaatje, Irving Layton and Al Purdy.

"An English professor [at the University of Toronto] named Gary Geddes asked me if I wanted to shoot them for a book," Grimson recalls. "There I was, a 22 year-old kid, taking pictures of the most powerful minds in Canadian literature."

At the time, he had just completed his undergraduate work at the University of Toronto and was on the verge of choosing a career. Torn between his passion for photography and the need for a more practical occupation, Grimson says he ended up opting for law school. That fall, he sold his camera and put all the negatives from the 1970 shoot in storage.

Now, almost 35 years later, the original portraits are on display for the first time, in an exhibition running until May 29 at the Dessinée Art Gallery, 2470 Yonge St.

The photographs have drawn considerable media attention and will be the subject of a photo spread in the September issue of The Walrus magazine.

"The interest is a surprise to me," says Grimson, now a real estate agent. "No one has associated me with a camera for 35 years. At the time, I was inseparable from the camera."

About a year ago, he decided to print the pictures. He says he was inspired by his uncle, Irving Fistell. "Five years ago, my uncle mounted an exhibition of his photographs after years of keeping the negatives in a shoe box.

"The exhibition was called 'Shots from a Shoe Box.' For the last 33 years my negatives were sitting in a cardboard box, just like my uncle's."

Grimson set up a darkroom in his home and taught himself how to develop prints.

"I mastered the art of printing eight by 10 prints. I saw the potential of 50 shots [from 1970] that were worth looking at."

Last spring, he went to a workshop that lets photographers meet critics and gallery owners. "People from the National Archives flipped when they saw the portraits. The pictures have considerable historical importance for Canadian heritage."

He says he originally hoped to mount a show during the International Authors Festival, but it wasn't possible.

Then, through a friend he met Ayala Sheinberg. "She asked if she could show the portraits in her gallery. I said, 'Why not?' I wanted them to be seen."

Grimson, a self-taught photographer who got his first camera at 17, has vivid memories of the 1970 project. Geddes noticed him taking pictures on campus and invited him to snap photographs for his book Fifteen Canadian Poets.

"Gary was taking me to meet all the poets," Grimson says. "Some became giants."

But he was not aware of their literary stature at the time and was able to take some candid and revealing shots, he says.

Almost half the poets depicted in the exhibition are dead: Purdy, Eli Mandel and John Newlove all died within the last year, while others such as Milton Acorn, Earle Birney and Gwendolyn MacEwen have been gone for some time.

Yet some are flourishing: Margaret Avison won the prestigious Griffin Prize for poetry last year, while George Bowering is Canada's poet laureate.

After his photographs were rejected by an American publication, Grimson went into law. "I realized I couldn't make a living at photography. I thought I could always get back into photography."

Thirty-four years later, he's back at it, doing portraits and landscapes, which he describes as "Zen-like pieces."

Grimson says he's excited by his current work and very proud of the 1970 portraits.

"It's taken 30 years to see what I did. It's taken this long to get the wisdom to appreciate what I shot almost subconsciously."

Re-issued classic is a Romeo and Juliet tale set in Montreal

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Where was Earth and High Heaven when I was studying Canlit back in the late '80s? To think that instead of plodding through Susanna Moodie's turgid Roughing It In The Bush, I could have been savouring Gwethalyn Graham's novel instead.

When originally published in 1944, Earth and High Heaven caused quite a stir. It earned Graham her second Governor General's Award and it topped the New York Times best-seller list for about 40 weeks. The film rights were sold to MGM Studios.

Unfortunately, Earth and High Heaven fell off the literary radar and today, few people have even heard of Graham.

But Comorant Press has re-released this book in trade paperback (326 pages) and added a new introduction by writer Norman Ravvin. Hopefully, now, this classic Canadian novel will be re-discovered.

Although at times overwritten and sentimental, Earth and High Heaven deserves to be read and discussed with other classic Canadian novels.

The story takes place in 1942 in Montreal, a city divided between three main ethnic groupings – French Catholics, English Protestants and Jews. As long as they stay out of each other's way, they get along fine.

But the status quo is threatening to implode in the Protestant Westmount home of Charles Drake when his daughter Erica, 28, falls in love with Marc Reiser, a 33-year-old Jewish lawyer, the son of Austrian immigrants.

Erica has a unique relationship with her father. He believes she is the only one he can have a serious conversation with and the only one who understands his duality – how he can talk like a progressive and act like a traditionalist. The two frequently hold intellectual debates in his study.

The theme of the novel is set beautifully in the opening pages when Marc is invited to the Drake home for a party by a Catholic friend René de Sevigny, whose sister has married Erica's brother.

Alienation sets in immediately. Marc is acutely aware of the gulf that separates him from everyone else in the room. He feels insecure and knows nobody. He withdraws alone to a corner of the room, trying to disappear, making his drink last as long as he can.

But he's not the only one trying to disappear. Erica, the self-described "invisible Drake," bored with normal party pleasantries, spots Marc and strikes a conversation.

Thinking her father would love to meet him, she goes to introduce Marc to him. But she only gets as far as "Reiser" before Charles snubs Marc, leaving the introduction incomplete.

Although Charles might consider himself progressive, he is rooted in old-world tradition: Jews don't interact with English Canadians (and they don't interact with French Canadians).

When she confronts him about his snub, Charles tells Erica, "Among the people we know, a Jewish lawyer sticks out like a sore thumb. He just doesn't fit; from a social point of view, he's unmanageable – he makes everybody else feel awkward. I have no objection to Jews, but that doesn't mean I want them in my home anymore than they want me in theirs – it works both ways."

Infuriated, Erica bites back: "We Canadians don't really disagree fundamentally with the Nazis about the Jews – we just think they go a bit too far."

When you consider Canada's poor record at accepting German Jews, that line is rather poignant. In the introduction, Ravvin quotes from a 1938 article that Graham, who is not Jewish, wrote in Saturday Night magazine.

"The Nazis jeer at us, say we make a great show of equality of race and creed, and criticize them for not wanting their Jews, while in actual fact we don't want them, either."

Erica's parents object when she makes a point of continuing to see Marc. He's not welcome in the house, so they have to arrange clandestine meetings. Charles insists that the only reason Marc is even interested in her is to improve his own social standing.

She responds by saying that the Drake connection isn't as important as it once was, "even to a Jewish lawyer. He's in the army, he's going overseas in a few months and he's got something else to think about besides running after the Drakes' daughter in order to improve his social, and indirectly his professional, standing."

But Charles refuses to be swayed. He believes he is acting in his daughter's own best interests.

"I don't want my daughter living in a kind of no-man's land where half the people you know will never accept him, and half the people he knows will never accept you."

He is also concerned that any children they might have together will be raised Jewish because, "Jews and Catholics could always be counted on to look out for their own interests – so Charles' grandchildren would be wholly Jewish by faith."

This does, in fact, turn out to be true. In a hotel-room rendezvous before he goes to Europe with his unit, Marc tells Erica any children they might have if they got married would be raised Jewish.

Erica is visibly shocked. "It was certainly going to take some getting used to."

Marc's parents, it should be pointed out, feel the same way as Erica's, although they play a lesser role in the novel.

On returning home for Yom Kippur services, Marc finds that his father's thoughts echo Charles' "no-man's land" statement.

"You'd just be nothing. It's like mixing oil and water. You can't do it, it doesn't work. You don't yet know how Jewish you are, otherwise you wouldn't be talking about marrying a Gentile; you'd realize that no matter how much you have in common, it doesn't make up for that one fundamental difference between you… no Jew and no Gentile that ever lived have the same outlook on life."

While it is easy to compare this book to William Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, it is interesting to note that Graham herself fell in love with a Jewish lawyer whom her dad refused to meet. This may have stirred her imagination for this novel, but certainly the theme had been brewing since she took a tour of Europe in the mid-1930s, where she noted the rise of fascism and anti-Semitism in Germany.

In Graham's Saturday Night magazine article, she wrote, "Canada has done little or nothing for humanity as a whole. We merely exist, harming no one, and doing no one any good, either. It is a record of mediocrity."

In writing Earth and High Heaven, Graham has also inadvertently written a book that sheds light on our past and may serve to enlighten Canadians to the ethnic and religious prejudices that are rooted in our history.

Courts and the classroom

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

When Marvin Zuker began his career in education law, most people had no idea that the courts belonged in the classrooms of the nation.

Today, there are firms with whole sections dealing with the education system, and library shelves stacked with laws, regulations and some of Zuker's many books and articles interpreting a field of law that is growing daily.

Lawyers, parents and educators can now consider the implications of a cornucopia of problems. They may find themselves discussing, debating and litigating zero tolerance and misconduct policies that affect their students. Or they may have to respond to allegations of sexual misconduct by teachers.

Ontario Student Records are kept at all public schools and teachers' reports are filed with the Ontario College of Teachers, Zuker said, but private schools do not have to check either of these records. However, the courts have decided that students in public and private schools who have been suspended or expelled are entitled to due process hearings.

For parents, education law can become a lifeline when their children have issues in their schools. For teachers, it is a matter of understanding their professional obligations and rights. For kids, it can become a maze that will determine where and how they can proceed with their lives.

And for Zuker, it has been a specialty since he graduated with a bachelor of law degree in 1966 and then a master's in education a few years later. He has practised, taught and now adjudicates in a world that draws constantly from various aspects of law and education.

Zuker began his teaching career with part-time work at Centennial College and Ryerson Institute of Technology (now Ryerson University) just a few years after graduating from law school. He began his career as a judge in 1978 when he was appointed to small claims court. In 1990, he moved to the family court system.

Zuker, who grew up in Toronto, said he attended school at Brunswick Talmud Torah, the forerunner of Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, until they threw him out in Grade 2.

"I guess I was a bit of a wild kid," Zuker said with a chuckle, and suggested that he may have been rebelling against his father's Orthodox affiliations. At that time, his family belonged to the Shaarei Shomayim Congregation on St. Clair Avenue. Today Zuker is a member of the Adath Israel Congregation.

After his Talmud Torah experience, Zuker moved to the public school system and attended Palmerston Avenue and John R. Wilcox public schools and then Vaughan Road Collegiate. After completing a BA at the University of Toronto, Zuker went on to study law at Osgoode Hall Law School.

While still a student at the University of Toronto, Zuker began his writing career as a reporter for the sports section of the Toronto Star.

"I would cover oblique weekend events like canoeing or lawn bowling" while I was a student at U of T, Zuker said in an interview.

In law school, he published a little paperback titled A Guide To Law. A few years later, he co-authored two books with June Callwood titled Canadian Women and the Law, which was published in 1971, and The Law is Not For Women, which appeared in 1975. The books were intended to be legal handbooks for women.

"It wasn't so many years ago that there were separate laws for men and women," Zuker explained, noting that when he went to law school, only 10 per cent of his class were women. Today some classes contain 60 per cent women.

Zuker was 22 years old when his mother, Pearl, died of cancer. But he believes it was her influence that prompted him to become interested in the discriminatory treatment of women in the law. And from his father Louis J. Zuker, who was also a lawyer, Marvin learned that no one should have ownership of knowledge about the law.

"Writing and sharing what I knew became important to me," Zuker said.

After becoming a lawyer, Zuker went to the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education at the University of Toronto (OISE) to do a masters in education, and that is when his interest in combining the two disciplines began.

Marvin Zuker

"In January 1982, Prof. Melvin Robbins retired and I started teaching education law in his place," Zuker said. He's been at OISE ever since, explaining the complex body of law that pertains to the classroom. He says he has taught more than 2,000 teachers in 22 years. His recent publications on education and the law include Education Law, co-authored with Anthony F. Brown, and Sexual Misconduct in Education, co-authored with Grant Bowers and Rena Knox.

Zuker said that over the years, he has developed "incredible compassion for the teaching profession," and he openly expresses scorn for governments and people who bash the profession.

"Teachers today perform so many roles. They become parents, psychologists and social workers," he said.

Instead of allocating funds towards smaller classroom sizes, a task the provincial government has recently undertaken, Zuker would rather see money committed to mandatory junior kindergarten classes. In fact, if he could amend anything today, he would extend compulsory education in Ontario from the age of four to 18, instead of six to 16.

When it comes to zero tolerance policies, Zuker believes there are many reasons to avoid suspensions and expulsions, the least of which is that "the cost of keeping children in the schools is much lower than the cost of keeping them in the criminal justice system."

Even though he was once supportive of zero tolerance policies, he said he is less convinced that suspensions or expulsions can really resolve any long-term problems because neither deals with the issue of rehabilitation.

Students return to school after suspensions without changing at all. The bully is still a bully and the victim may still be traumatized, he said.

Attention needs to be paid to the child who is abusing as well as to the student who has been affected by the abuse.

"I would like to see a focus on the rehabilitation of the student as well as an involvement in the process with the victim." Otherwise, chances are that neither student will be able to fit back into the school environment successfully, Zuker said.

In terms of expulsions, Zuker suggested that keeping students in school may keep them out of the criminal justice system.

"I rarely, if ever, have had a young offender in court who was going to school," he said.

He advocates keeping school buildings open late into the evening so that kids can hang out on basketball courts and baseball diamonds instead of in malls and streets.

There needs to be a closer relationship between the Ministry of Education and the attorney general's office, Zuker said, so that more effort can be made to ensure that kids stay in school.

As for the funding of faith-based schools, he said that philosophically he "believes in free choice."

But, he added, the reality is that choice is dictated by income, and therefore tax credits limit the availability of certain schools to those who can afford private education. Instead, Zuker would support a voucher system where money is collected from everyone and then distributed to children who need it.

He also believes that if private schools were funded they would need to be regulated.

"If there was full funding for private schools, there would need to be some regulation in place. Of course, schools could always opt out of the funding and remain private," he said.

Six-year-old sells lemonade for the heart

Amanda Belzowski, 6, is an old hand at selling lemonade. For the past five years, a few weeks before the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario's annual Becel Ride for Heart, Amanda and her family have set up a lemonade stand, and customers have bought her cooling drinks to help raise funds for heart and stroke research in Canada. On Sunday, May 16, from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m., the young entrepreneur and her family will once again be at her stand at 10 Briancliff Drive (off Lawrence, west of Leslie, and across from Edwards Gardens).

Young entrepreneur seeks to bring her total up to $10,000 raised for heart and stroke research

The Belzowski family, which participates in the Becel Ride for Heart every year, takes the foundation's work to heart. Amanda's grandmother and great-grandfather have both undergone successful heart surgeries (each had an artificial aortic valve replacement). In the past five years, Amanda has raised $7,000 selling lemonade. This year, her goal is to bring her total up to $10,000.

The May 16 lemonade stand event, an initiative by the Belzowski family with support from the community, will include entertainment by children's recording artist Dan the Music Man and balloonmaker Kenton Kruger of the Twisted Ones, as well as an opportunity for kids to make buttons with their favorite slogans (courtesy of World Star Entertainment) and go on pony rides (courtesy of Lionel's Pony Farm and Petting Zoo).

The 17th Annual Becel Ride for Heart kicks off on Sunday, June 6, at 8 a.m., with a separate in-line skating event beginning at 7:45 a.m. The biggest one-day fundraising event for the Heart and Stroke Foundation of Ontario, the Becel Ride for Heart is expected to raise $1.55 million this year.

Registration for the ride takes place up until the day of the event at various locations in the Toronto area. For more information, call Diane Hargrave at 416-467-9954, or to register, call 416-486-RIDE, or visit www.heartandstroke.ca/rideforheart.

RPI Engineer loves the NCAA hockey experience

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There's something about the enthusiasm and sheer fun of sporting events in the United States that is rarely duplicated in Canada.

Oren Eizenman has experienced it first-hand. The freshman centre with the RPI Engineers of the Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute, who play in the NCAA's Eastern College Athletic Conference (ECAC), is still awed by a key matchup earlier this season against the school's arch-rival Clarkson.

The game was billed as the "big red freak out" and 5,180 fans jammed into the team's home rink to cheer the Engineers to victory.

As Eizenman recalls it, "everybody wears red and pretty much goes crazy."

The fans maintained a deafening roar throughout the contest, but they kicked it up a notch when RPI scored a goal.

Eizenman, who played junior A hockey with Wexford Raiders in Toronto the year before, was instrumental in RPI's 3-2 win over Clarkson, scoring the tying goal and setting up the winner.

For the winner, he skated out of the corner, found open ice at the top of the faceoff circle, faked a shot and passed it to an unguarded winger at the side of the crease who put the puck into a gaping net.

"The place just erupted," he said. "It was amazing. They were screaming at the tops of their lungs. For the players, it was amazing."

College sport in the United States is huge, and many of RPI's home games in Troy, N.Y., are televised locally and via satellite.

It's a far cry from the Canadian Junior A experience, where fans sit quietly and enjoy the finer points of the game, or even from major junior hockey in the Ontario Hockey League (OHL).

In his last season with the Raiders, he scored 59 points in 45 games and was fifth in playoff scoring in the south conference of the Ontario Hockey Association. His performance attracted the attention of college scouts, who knew he came from a hockey-playing family. Older brothers Alon and Erez are both accomplished players.

Alon, who played at Penn State for four years and attended a Pittsburgh Penguins training camp before spending a year playing pro hockey in France, is now attending the University of Toronto. Erez, who's in the engineering program at U of T, also played competitive hockey, including for the Israeli national team. Oren credits both brothers with teaching him the game at an early age.

Prior to accepting a full four-year scholarship at RPI, Eizenman, 19, attended the Erie Otters' training camp and was offered a spot on the OHL team after winning its pre-season scoring title.

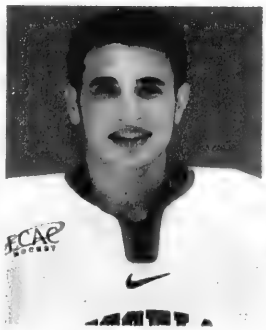
But he chose college instead, knowing he could still play high-calibre hockey, get noticed by NHL scouts, and receive an education that could prove crucial if his pro prospects don't pan out.

Eizenman doesn't regret his decision to play in the NCAA. In fact, he still gushes about the year he's had at RPI and the atmosphere in American college sports.

Hockey is the school's only Division 1 sport, so the team is highly regarded on campus, he said. What's more, there is something special about RPI, a feeling he had even when he was being courted by other NCAA schools, including Harvard and Yale.

"There's something about it. It's not tangible. I just knew this was the right place for me. I don't regret the decision. I'm getting a first-rate education and the hockey is great."

It took Eizenman a little bit of time to adjust to the college game, but he made great strides over the course of the season, said Andrew Will, the team's assistant coach.



Oren Eizenman

"Oren had a great first year for us," Will said. "He was in a group of freshmen called upon to really help the team. He kind of rose to the top of that group."

Although Eizenman's numbers were modest – six goals and 12 assists in 37 games – his on-ice responsibilities increased as the season wore on.

By the end of the year, he was centering the team's second line, taking key faceoffs in both the offensive and defensive zones, and was being asked to provide some offence.

"Oren is a playmaker," Will said. "He sees the ice very well. He does a very good job of trying to anticipate the play, to see it one step ahead."

With his good speed, passing ability and attention to defensive responsibilities, Will sees Eizenman becoming the team's top centre next season. Eizenman can expect work on the power play and penalty killing.

All he has to do is to work on improving his strength and his defensive work, Will said.

With his season over – RPI lost its second round playoff to Dartmouth two games to one after sweeping Princeton 2-0 in the first round – Eizenman has already hit the weight room. At six feet, 185 pounds, he believes he can add muscle and improve his ability to come out of the corners with the puck.

While working out this summer, Eizenman will pay close attention to the NHL entry draft. Rumour has it that Central Scouting has him rated as a fifth-round prospect, and attending a pro camp is something he would relish.

But RPI remains in his plans, and for next year "everyone's expecting our team to do well," he said. "I don't want to disappoint anyone, least of all myself."

המסע לשם, מאת: גלילה רון-פדר-עמית

גלילה רון-פדר-עמית ביקרה בפולין עם משלחות בני נוער במסגרת "מצעד החיים". ספרה, המסע לשם מביא את סיפורו של נער בכיתה ט' וסבו, ניצול שואה המוזמן להצטרף למסע כאחד שהיה שם".

BLACK GOLD COOKIES

3 oz. unsweetened chocolate, chopped coarse
18 oz. semisweet chocolate, chopped coarse
1 stick + 1 tblsp. unsalted butter, softened
3 large eggs
1 cup + 2 tblsp. white sugar
1 tblsp. instant espresso powder
1 tblsp. vanilla
6 tblsp. sifted all-purpose flour
3/4 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. baking powder
1 1/2 cups walnuts
1 1/2 cup pecans

Preheat oven to 325°F
In double boiler or metal bowl set over a pan of barely simmering water melt unsweetened chocolate, 9 oz. semisweet chocolate and butter; stir occasionally; remove from heat
In bowl with an electric mixer beat eggs with sugar until light and fluffy. Add espresso powder, vanilla, and chocolate mixture; beat until smooth. In small bowl whisk together flour, baking powder, and salt and add to chocolate mixture, beating until just combined Stir in remaining semisweet chocolate and nuts until combined well.
Scoop out 1/2 cup measures of cookie dough, arranging them 3" apart on ungreased baking sheets. Bake cookies in batches in middle of oven 25 min. or until tops began to crack (do not overbake). Cool cookies on a rack

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman

Judaism sees economic activity as part and parcel of a moral way of life that brings us closer to God. Government, as a prime source of economic activity, has an obligation to create a climate in which honesty and integrity in our financial affairs is the norm. This demands constant vigilance to ensure not only that deceptive practices – such as misleading advertisements – are banned, but that the temptation for wrongdoing is minimized. Even creating a perception of misconduct is a violation of Halachah (because it is ma'arit ayin).

This is especially so with public figures who have easy access to money and power (or its distribution) and are often fodder for gossip and slander. Thus our sages rule that the kohanim servicing the Temple were not allowed to have pockets, lest they be accused – falsely or perhaps not – of personally pocketing money. In fact, seven keys and seven people were needed to open the vaults of cash in the temple. Our internal controls must be the strongest when dealing with religious and charitable institutions.

Jewish law insists that public funds are to be collected only in groups of two and distributed in groups of three. To allow otherwise invites accusations of, or perhaps even actual, corruption. It thus appears that one should not give charity in cash to a lone individual. If there is no witness, one should write a cheque. In fact, the Torah itself spends many verses detailing Moshe's accounting of monies raised to build the tabernacle, an accounting necessitated by grumblings that Moshe was benefiting personally from the public till. Even (and perhaps especially) a Moshe Rabbeinu must not allow even the slightest pretext for charges of wrongdoings.

These concepts call for all public institutions to conduct their activities in a transparent manner. Paper trails must be kept and no expenditures should be approved without proper mechanisms being followed. Contracts must be awarded on the basis of merit, not nepotism or convenience. At the same time, there is no reason to insist that all governmental contracts be awarded only to those firms who have no connections with government. As long as the decision-making process is conducted in an independent, open and honest fashion, all members of society should be allowed to compete equally, including former partners or relatives of cabinet ministers.

Managing Jewish fear

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Have you ever been a victim of anti-Semitism in Toronto? Most of us haven't and don't know anyone who has. I believe it's appropriate to say that we live in a city and country whose fundamental ideology is inclusive and accepting of Jews and others. It's a much different situation than in Europe, whose nationalism is built upon exclusion.

Despite this, a recent increase in higher profile acts of anti-Semitism in the Toronto area has set off a seemingly disproportionate level of fear in our community.

Clearly, anti-Semitism is increasing worldwide, is scary, and requires our serious and ongoing attention. However, how we manage and respond to our fear of anti-Semitism in Toronto needs to be strategic and kept in context so that it does not immobilize our community but instead empowers us.

One way of doing this is by looking at our past, a time when more people in the community were involved in the actual fight. As an example, in the 1960s, 70s and 80s, certain community members organized themselves into cells that safeguarded our cemeteries and Jewish institutions. These groups were made up of men and women from all walks of Jewish life who took great pride in their hands-on efforts to strengthen our community and personal freedoms.

They were frontline Jews who witnessed the realities of anti-Semitism in Toronto, as well as the reality that not every non-Jew is hateful toward us or at all supportive of anti-Semitic acts. Their physical involvement allowed them – like Jews living in or visiting Israel, who experience less fear than Jews in the Diaspora following a terrorist attack – to manage their fear in a healthy, more empowering way.

Nowadays, however, the Jewish community relies more on security companies to guard us. We do because the onerous task of fighting anti-Semitism has been left to a small group of overworked professional Jews and their relatively small contingent of volunteer counterparts. This phenomenon is reflective of changes in society in general, in which caring and helping those in need has become more institutionalized, and less individualized, over the last decade or so.

Effectively, this model has placed the responsibility on the shoulders of a few, and it has distanced amchah – the grassroots community – from enacting the Jewish imperative of shomer nafshoteichem, guarding oneself. It has also heightened our sense of fear.

A modern day Jewish team of shomrim (guardians) may or may not be a good idea. I accept the fact that economics likely play a role in current decisions. However, the lesson we can take from these ambitious and proud Jews is the importance of a shared workload and the advantages of mass activism.

Like a very weary Moses who was commanded by God to set up courts to share the job of judging, the Toronto Jewish community also needs to broaden the responsibility for taking care of ourselves.

Jews respect courage. Evidence of this is found in hundreds of publications that celebrate rescuers during the Holocaust, and the popularity of films such as Schindler's List and the docudrama Perlasca: An Italian Hero about Giorgio Perlasca, a non-Jewish Italian who creatively and boldly saved 3,500 Jews in occupied Hungary.

It is not enough, however, to admire courage. We need to emulate it and find our own personal and collective bravery, resources and ingenuity in the fight against anti-Semitism and for peace with our friends.

By mobilizing ourselves in Toronto, during a time of peace, like the rescuers did during a time of war, we can better manage our fear and ensure that our future is filled with spiritual wealth and physical security.

Money Matters

Judaism sees economic activity as part and parcel of a moral way of life that brings us closer to God. Government, as a prime source of economic activity, has an obligation to create a climate in which honesty and integrity in our financial affairs is the norm. This demands constant vigilance to ensure not only that deceptive practices – such as misleading advertisements – are banned, but that the temptation for wrongdoing is minimized. Even creating a perception of misconduct is a violation of Halachah (because it is ma'arit ayin).

This is especially so with public figures who have easy access to money and power (or its distribution) and are often fodder for gossip and slander. Thus our sages rule that the kohanim servicing the Temple were not allowed to have pockets, lest they be accused – falsely or perhaps not – of personally pocketing money. In fact, seven keys and seven people were needed to open the vaults of cash in the temple. Our internal controls must be the strongest when dealing with religious and charitable institutions.

Jewish law insists that public funds are to be collected only in groups of two and distributed in groups of three. To allow otherwise invites accusations of, or perhaps even actual, corruption. It thus appears that one should not give charity in cash to a lone individual. If there is no witness, one should write a cheque. In fact, the Torah itself spends many verses detailing Moshe's accounting of monies raised to build the tabernacle, an accounting necessitated by grumblings that Moshe was benefiting personally from the public till. Even (and perhaps especially) a Moshe Rabbeinu must not allow even the slightest pretext for charges of wrongdoings.

These concepts call for all public institutions to conduct their activities in a transparent manner. Paper trails must be kept and no expenditures should be approved without proper mechanisms being followed. Contracts must be awarded on the basis of merit, not nepotism or convenience. At the same time, there is no reason to insist that all governmental contracts be awarded only to those firms who have no connections with government. As long as the decision-making process is conducted in an independent, open and honest fashion, all members of society should be allowed to compete equally, including former partners or relatives of cabinet ministers.

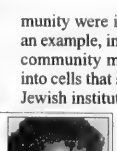
URBAN WRITER



Have you ever been a victim of anti-Semitism in Toronto? Most of us haven't and don't know anyone who has. I believe it's appropriate to say that we live in a city and country whose fundamental ideology is inclusive and accepting of Jews and others. It's a much different situation than in Europe, whose nationalism is built upon exclusion.

Despite this, a recent increase in higher profile acts of anti-Semitism in the Toronto area has set off a seemingly disproportionate level of fear in our community.

Clearly, anti-Semitism is increasing worldwide, is scary, and requires our serious and ongoing attention. However, how we manage and respond to our fear of anti-Semitism in Toronto needs to be strategic and kept in context so that it does not immobilize our community but instead empowers us.

One way of doing this is by looking at our past, a time when more people in the community were involved in the actual fight. As an example, in the 1960s, 70s and 80s, certain community members organized themselves into cells that safeguarded our cemeteries and Jewish institutions. These groups were made up of men and women from all walks of Jewish life who took great pride in their hands-on efforts to strengthen our community and personal freedoms.

They were frontline Jews who witnessed the realities of anti-Semitism in Toronto, as well as the reality that not every non-Jew is hateful toward us or at all supportive of anti-Semitic acts. Their physical involvement allowed them – like Jews living in or visiting Israel, who experience less fear than Jews in the Diaspora following a terrorist attack – to manage their fear in a healthy, more empowering way.

Nowadays, however, the Jewish community relies more on security companies to guard us. We do because the onerous task of fighting anti-Semitism has been left to a small group of overworked professional Jews and their relatively small contingent of volunteer counterparts. This phenomenon is reflective of changes in society in general, in which caring and helping those in need has become more institutionalized, and less individualized, over the last decade or so.

Effectively, this model has placed the responsibility on the shoulders of a few, and it has distanced amchah – the grassroots community – from enacting the Jewish imperative of shomer nafshoteichem, guarding oneself. It has also heightened our sense of fear.

A modern day Jewish team of shomrim (guardians) may or may not be a good idea. I accept the fact that economics likely play a role in current decisions. However, the lesson we can take from these ambitious and proud Jews is the importance of a shared workload and the advantages of mass activism.

Like a very weary Moses who was commanded by God to set up courts to share the job of judging, the Toronto Jewish community also needs to broaden the responsibility for taking care of ourselves.

Jews respect courage. Evidence of this is found in hundreds of publications that celebrate rescuers during the Holocaust, and the popularity of films such as Schindler's List and the docudrama Perlasca: An Italian Hero about Giorgio Perlasca, a non-Jewish Italian who creatively and boldly saved 3,500 Jews in occupied Hungary.

It is not enough, however, to admire courage. We need to emulate it and find our own personal and collective bravery, resources and ingenuity in the fight against anti-Semitism and for peace with our friends.

By mobilizing ourselves in Toronto, during a time of peace, like the rescuers did during a time of war, we can better manage our fear and ensure that our future is filled with spiritual wealth and physical security.

Israel appoints Arab jurist to top court

By YUVAL YOAZ and BARUCH KRA
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In a historical move, the Israeli Judicial Appointments Committee last week named an Arab jurist as a permanent member of the country's highest court.

Salim Jubran, 57, will soon be sworn in as a justice of the Supreme Court, along with Esther Hayut, Elyakim Rubinstein and state prosecutor Edna Arbel.

Jubran, who has a degree in law from Hebrew University, was born in Haifa. His expertise is in the field of criminal law.

Salim Jubran

Arbel, 60, is moving to the Supreme Court bench following an eight-year stint as state prosecutor. She studied law at Hebrew University and also obtained a master's degree in law at Bar-Ilan University.

At 51, Hayut is the youngest justice in nearly a decade to be appointed to the Supreme Court. She has a law degree from Tel Aviv Universtiy Rubinstein, 57, holds degrees in law, literature, contemporary Judaism and Arabic from Hebrew University.

Supreme Court President Aharon Barak and Justice Minister Yosef Lapid also chose Jerusalem Court district court judge Yonatan Adi'el for a temporary post on the court bench.

Lapid praised the panel after the vote. "The results of this vote are a message to the political arena saying that this committee is staffed by people committed to the interests of the judicial system," Lapid said. He also commended the balance in having two men and two women selected for the bench.

Arbel's term as state prosecutor ended amid controversy over her recommendation to indict Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on suspicion of bribery arising from allegations surrounding his time in office when he was the foreign minister in 1996.

Peace is possible: former Shin Bet head

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ami Ayalon, the former director of Shin Bet, Israel's domestic intelligence agency, expressed optimism last week that Israel and the Palestinians can achieve a peaceful accommodation within his lifetime.

Ayalon, 58, will be in Toronto next week to promote the People's Voice initiative, a grassroots peace movement he and Palestinian political activist and educator Sari Nusseibeh founded two years ago and officially launched in 2003.

Nusseibeh, president of Al Quds University, was formerly the Palestinian Authority's representative in eastern Jerusalem.

Ami Ayalon

He and Ayalon will deliver speeches at Holy Blossom Temple on Wednesday, May 19 starting at 8 p.m. Bob Rae, the former premier of Ontario, will introduce them.

The People's Voice envisages an end-of-conflict accord and a two-state solution based on the June 4, 1967, borders, with the possibility of mutually agreed territorial exchanges.

"In my lifetime, we won't have a European kind of peace," Ayalon said in an interview from London last week. "But stability with the Palestinians, based more or less on the principles of our initiative, is possible."

New Genealogy Group

HAMILTON — The Jewish Genealogical Society of Hamilton and Area attracted what it called a "sell-out crowd" to its first meeting late last month at the Hamilton Public Library's Dundas branch. The new group was launched by amateur genealogists Moishe Gold, Hazel Boon and Barry Skinner, who spoke about "Finding Your Jewish Roots." Next meeting is June 15 at Hamilton's Jewish Community Centre. E-mail HamiltonJewishGen@canada.com for details.

WORLD

Anti-Semitism Up

PARIS — Anti-Semitic attacks in France rose sharply in the first quarter of 2004. Figures from the Interior Ministry, which collates statistics along with Jewish groups, showed 67 acts of violence against Jewish people or property since the start of the year, up from 42 in the last quarter of 2003. But the number of incidents fell from 191 to 160 over the same period last year. The rise in recorded attacks could stem from increased police activity and the Jewish community's efforts to urge victims to report attacks, the ministry said.

Papon Appeal Denied

PARIS — France denied Maurice Papon's appeal of his conviction for his World War II-era crimes. France's highest court of appeals ruled April 29 it would review the case against Papon, but only to decide if the law was properly followed, not on the substance of the conviction. Papon, 92, was sentenced in 1998 to 10 years for his role in the deportation of some 1,500 Jews from southwest France to Nazi death camps in 1942, when he was a Vichy France official. In 2002, he was released on medical grounds.

Rabbi Attacked

PARIS — A rabbi was attacked May 1 near his shul in a suburb south of Paris. Rabbi James Mallul of the Chabad-Lubavitch synagogue in Creteil, was hit in the face and stomach by two men as he walked to evening services with his son. In another incident, a swastika and Nazi slogans were scrawled on a synagogue in northern France. Members of the tiny Jewish community in Valenciennes filed a police complaint, and security has been stepped up outside the building.

B'nai Brith Gets Coat of Arms

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada received a coat of arms from Ontario Lt.-Gov. James Bartleman last week, the first time a national Jewish organization has received the honour. "This is a great moment in the history of our organization," outgoing B'nai Brith president Rochelle Wilner said.

Bombed Bus in D.C.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — The burned-out shell of a bus blown up in a Jerusalem terror attack will be displayed in Washington, D.C., for a month. Zaka emergency services sent the bus, previously displayed outside the International Court of Justice at The Hague, to be displayed opposite Capitol Hill as part of a worldwide campaign against Palestinian terror.

Life Insurers Sued

LOS ANGELES — Insurers refusing to issue life insurance policies to Americans who have travelled or plan to travel to Israel are being sued. Filed in Los Angeles Superior Court, the lawsuit accuses 14 insurance companies of unfair business practices under California law and seeks an injunction forbidding firms from denying insurance to travellers to Israel. Allen Estrin, the plaintiff, said he applied for insurance but was turned down because of a trip he made to Israel two years ago. Jack Dolan, a spokesperson for the American Council of Life Insurers, said that travel to any country "where health or security concerns exist is a legitimate factor… in deciding whether to underwrite a life insurance policy."

Kosher Meat & Greet

NEW YORK — Diners feasted on quail, cow udder, venison, goat, bison and other exotic meats at a special Orthodox Union dinner last week. After a daylong conference in on how to recognize appropriate species of animals and make them kosher, diners met at Manhattan's Levana restaurant for a $161-a-plate meal of hard-to-get kosher meats. The purpose was to perpetuate Jewish traditions about certain kosher animals that are rarely eaten today, OU officials said.

European media anti-Israel, Gideon Meir charges

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The European media are fostering anti-Semitism without intentionally being anti-Semitic, a top-ranking official of Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs declared in Toronto last week.

Through "biased coverage" of Israel's conflict with the Palestinians, newspapers and television and radio stations in Europe are fanning hatred of Jews and Israel, claimed Gideon Meir.

As deputy director general for media and public affairs, he often appears on foreign news programs as an Israeli spokesman.

"The way the media covers the story in the Middle East goes against the standards and ethics of journalism. It's time for a new ethos."

Some journalists are indifferent to "the facts" and perceive Israel as David, and the Palestinians as Goliath, he charged.

"You see more and more articles in Europe questioning the legitimacy of the Jewish state."

Citing an example, he mentioned the case of a Sky TV interviewer in Britain who asked a senior Israeli cabinet minister why Zionists settled in Palestine rather than in Uganda.

Belittling the point that media bias is caused by Israel's failure to resolve its differences with the Palestinians, he observed, "The media should reflect reality and not be biased."

Turning to Canada, Meir said media outlets here possesses "some of the characteristics" of the European media.

Asked whether the Canadian media foment anti-Semitism, Meir – the deputy chief of mission at the Israeli embassy in Ottawa in the mid-1980s – admitted he lacked sufficient data to address the issue properly.

But he praised The Gazette, a Montreal daily, for running a photograph of Palestinian gunmen using children to draw Israeli fire.

"No other paper published this photo," he said, later urging Jews to support Canadian media supportive of Israel.

In Toronto on the tail-end of a Canada-wide tour sponsored by the Jewish National Fund, Meir explained he was here "to tell the world the truth" about biased media coverage of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

"I'm not blaming the media for being anti-Semitic," he said at a press conference at the Windsor Arms Hotel. "The media is not anti-Semitic. Journalists are not anti-Semitic."

But their reporting engenders anti-Semitism, he asserted.

Saying he does not expect journalists to be pro-Israel, and admitting Israel deserves to be criticized at times, Meir said all he expects of the media is fairness and accuracy. "I don't want to see a journalist working on behalf of Israel."

Speaking of journalists who file one-sided stories, Meir said some of the worst offenders are Jews. He did not elaborate.

A double standard is at work when the media deal with terrorism facing Israel and terrorism facing the rest of the world, he pointed out.

Terrorists are moulded by the doctrines of radical Islam, not the Arab-Israeli dispute, he noted.

Brutally detailed honesty

From the editor's desk

Israelis are renowned for their honesty. Truth is a social as well as a moral imperative. Politesse and nuance are mere etiquettes. In their eyes, an imperative will always supercede an etiquette. North Americans do not always see things the same way. Our code of behaviour allows for the supremacy of etiquette where we perceive personal sensibilities are at risk. In those circumstances, truth is less an imperative than a value-added bonus.

There is, thus, very little doubt about the provenance of the brutally honest novel Clean Death in Tel Aviv. It could only have been written by an Israeli.

The protagonist in Rachel Elboim-Dror's first novel, Ruth Levin, is a bright, highly-touted, all too human, vulnerable researcher/scholar at the Biological Institute of the University of Tel Aviv, who plunges into a no-holds-barred struggle with the truth of her own life that is precipitated by a crisis in her professional career.

Early in the story, in the throes of a gut-heaving panic attack, Ruth sets the course of the novel's literary trajectory.

"Of all the people I know, I am most baffled by myself. I experience my life as a mirage, as a fictitious narrative, lacking reality. Only when I am deeply hurt and in pain do I know myself as a material entity. If I were asked: who are you? I could not give an honest answer. Who the hell am I? What is the essence of myself? What is the essential me? Who am I behind the mask of a docile smile, behind the act of obedient daughter and wife, what is the real thing-in-itself? When people call my name, I wonder whom they are calling? The facade? I am unable to peel off my own masks. I devised a mask and it became me. I will never be able to lift the disguise to meet myself, confront myself fact to face."

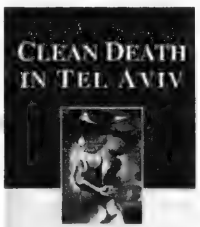
Of course, the deeply self-doubting Ruth is wrong. For "lifting the disguise," "confronting" herself is precisely what she proceeds to do quite brilliantly in the ensuing pages of the book, with consequences, however, that are unsettling, if ambiguous.

Her self-evaluation begins with her earliest memories of life in eastern Europe and arrival in pre-state Israel as a very young child. She describes the intra-familial relationships poignantly and painfully.

The seminal family relationship, not surprisingly, is that with her mother. And though she clearly loves her mother, Ruth does not flinch from describing the woman in unambiguous terms: problematic, domineering, abusive and manipulative.

Ruth's father was an intellectual who threw himself and his family into the millennial ideal of living the Zionists' pioneer dream – reclaiming the land and building a communal utopia on the ancestral homeland.

Between the dream and the reality, however, as a poet once wrote, fell the "shadow" of the experience, especially as depicted by Elboim-Dror.



Rachel Elboim-Dror

Irrigating a parched, barren land, or draining mosquito-infested swamps, or fending off marauding Arab gangs, or living in bare, cramped, subsistence quarters, or remaining unfettered in a tangled web of problematic relationships and troubled emotions was, for the most part, arduous, bone-wearying, dangerous work. Elboim-Dror boldly captures this raw truth without lacquer or lustre, as perceived by the developing cognitive and psychological filter of a maturing, young woman.

When Ruth marries and leaves her parental home for her new matrimonial home, she merely exchanges the tyranny of her mother for that of her cold, self-centred husband, a successful, highly respected neurosurgeon.

The tearing conundrum with which Ruth agonizingly wrestles throughout the novel is: why? Why did she submit to the domination of both her mother and her husband? The question taunts and torments her. And like the patriarch Jacob, who is wounded wrestling with a mysterious stranger through a long, foreboding night, Ruth too is left impaired by her own nightmarish struggle.

Ruth's courageous insights into self and surroundings, of course, operate at two levels: the personal and the universal. Herein, of course, lies one of the work's chief rewards.

Elboim-Dror is an accomplished scholar. The first woman to become a full professor at Hebrew University, she has both a master's and a doctoral degree from Harvard University. She was also one of the first women to become a commissioned officer in the IDF.

Clean Death in Tel Aviv was chosen by the Pais Saphir Foundation for Literature as one of the best Hebrew-language novels published in Israel in 1999. It has also been published in Spanish and is now available in English through iUniverse, Inc. Books (ISBN 0-595-27062-X). It is a compelling read, that often causes the reader to wince in sadness.

Watchdog fights anti-Israel bias in the media

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

Frustration is the immediate reaction for many Canadians who see inaccurate or unfair media coverage of Israel and the Middle East, the head of a new media watchdog group says.

"One of the biggest dangers of the media is that it is highly influential on how people see the world," said Dov Smith, the Toronto-based executive director of HonestReporting Canada, an affiliate of the American group HonestReporting.

Smith said that when people come across one-sided Canadian reporting on the Middle East, they are often unsure about how to constructively address the issue.

HonestReporting Canada works with its 4,000 members to fight anti-Israel bias in the news media, he said.

"Bias creeps into news reporting for a variety of reasons, and often at an unconscious level," said Smith. "We do not expect the news media to give Israel a free ride, just a fair shake."

He said his group urges Canadians across the country to function as "patrollers" of the news they consume.

Smith said HonestReporting Canada wants the media to stop using distortive terms such as "cycle of violence," because they remove accountability and "trivialize what's much more complex."

Distinguishing between aggression and the response to aggression in the Middle East has been another objective, said Smith.

He said there is an obvious difference between a headline that directly blames Israeli soldiers for killing Palestinian civilians and another stating that Jewish civilians died in a bus bombing with no mention of those responsible.

HonestReporting Canada's website, www.honestreporting.ca, highlights examples of biases that taint what should be balanced journalism, Smith said.

Examples of the group's work include a release titled "Reading Between the Lines at the Toronto Star," which contends an April 20 Star editorial suggested that "Israeli occupation is the problem, and Palestinian violence a mere reaction."

The organization also informed its members about what it called biased wording in the CBC website backgrounder titled "In Depth Middle East."

Smith said 30 members who were outraged by the document's presentation of the history of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict wrote letters to demand that its wording be changed.

Part of the initial wording read: "Since May of 1948 when the modern state of Israel was proclaimed, the land has had two parallel histories, one for the Jews who control the state and one for the Palestinians whose homeland the nation was built on."

After protest, the passage was changed to: "… and one for the Palestinians who say the nation was built on their homeland."

"While the change is subtle, it is just a first indicator of success in what will be an ongoing campaign to encourage fairer coverage," Smith said.

HonestReporting Canada is also urging the media to identify organizations designated as terrorist groups under Canadian law.

Smith said so-called Palestinian "militant groups" such as Hamas, Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigades all fall under this category, although Canadian media shy away from reporting it.

"We must push them to do that, because fundamental facts are not being communicated," he said.

Since part of its goal has been to expose parts of the Middle East story that mainstream media outlets have ignored, HonestReporting Canada is promoting Relentless: The Struggle for Peace in Israel.

The one-hour documentary, produced by the group's U.S. affiliate, examines "the history of the Mideast conflict and how the peace process unravelled in a surge of violence," HonestReporting Canada's website says.

"The film is made up of primary footage, events that actually occurred," said Smith. "It shows powerful scenes, like the education of children to hate and to kill."

Smith admits that some viewers have been "deflated" by the film, which has so far been screened mainly for Jewish audiences.

He said the answer is for people to get involved with his group by subscribing to its mailing list. He also urges people to monitor the media and report biased findings.

As well, HonestReporting Canada is seeking volunteers to participate in bias studies and community advocacy training sessions, he said.

Zundel calls Jewish leaders to testify at deportation hearing

Holocaust denier says pressure led to charge he's a security threat

By RON CSILLAG

Staff Reporter

Leaders from Canada's two main Jewish organizations could find out this week whether they must testify at the deportation hearing of Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel.

Federal Court of Canada Justice Pierre Blais reserved judgment last week on subpoenas served by Zundel's lawyer on Keith Landy, the outgoing president of Canadian Jewish Congress, and Frank Dimant, executive vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada.

Zundel's lawyer, Peter Lindsay, told his client's hearing that he wants Landy and Dimant to testify in order to prove that the federal government succumbed to political pressure when it issued a national security certificate against Zundel a year ago.

Lindsay argued that Ottawa, in effect, over-reacted by issuing the certificate, which is used rarely and only against non-citizens who pose a security threat, notably those with ties to terrorist groups.

The matter before the court is the legality of the certificate. If it is upheld, Zundel, 65, could finally be deported to his native Germany after more than 20 years of legal wrangling.

The notorious pro-Nazi publisher, who is a landed immigrant in Canada, has been held in a Toronto jail for more than a year since being deported from the United States last winter for overstaying his visa.

Lindsay argued Canada wants Zundel deported because of his views and not because he poses a legitimate security threat. He implied the security certificate was signed by two cabinet ministers who caved in to interest groups.

The lawyer for the Justice Department told the court there is "not a scintilla" of evidence to support the argument that the government bowed to pressure from Jewish advocacy or other groups.

Judy Chan, who represented CJC at the hearing, told The CJN that Landy's subpoena should be quashed because it seeks evidence that is neither relevant nor necessary.

She said there is "no possible way" for the CJC president to know what evidence led to the issuing of the security certificate against Zundel. That information is secret and was forwarded to cabinet by the RCMP and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS).

She called the subpoena aimed at her client "unwarranted," and "an instrument of harassment and inconvenience." For one, it is unrealistically broad in scope, she said, because it asks CJC to produce all documents related to Zundel and CSIS.

Chan also argued that the subpoena was invalid because it was issued without leave from the court. She noted that subpoenas may be issued without leave only in trials or in matters involving a legal reference – not at hearings of this kind.

Expecting this argument, Lindsay asked the judge in a separate motion to make the subpoenas valid.

Lindsay's manoeuvrings amount to "a fishing expedition ...a tactic to delay the final hearing in this matter," Landy told The CJN.

Landy said he shies away from the word "pressure."

Congress "has always urged that Zundel be deported. We believe [he] is a menace and a danger to Canadians generally. It's up to us to as an advocacy group to make representations to the government."

He said CJC was never privy to the information that led to the issuing of the security certificate.

Marvin Kurz, lawyer for B'nai Brith Canada, also sought to have Dimant's subpoena quashed on the grounds it was issued improperly.

He said Lindsay's argument implied that Jewish groups were involved in a "conspiracy" to have Zundel deported. Kurz also warned that Zundel would use Landy's and Dimant's testimonies "as a forum for anti-Semitism."

Blais also reserved judgment on two other subpoenas, one issued against a former lawyer for Zundel who is now a judge, and the other against the author of a book about alleged wrongdoing at CSIS.

Ontario Court judge Lauren Marshall, who was on Zundel's defence team at his 1985 false news trial, retained a lawyer to have the subpoena quashed, saying she had no relevant evidence to offer.

Also trying to stay off the witness stand is Andrew Mitrovica, author of Covert Entry, a book about CSIS. Zundel's lawyers are said to be especially interested in the book's allegation that in 1995, the spy agency failed to warn Zundel about a pipe bomb it knew had been mailed to him.

Zundel's drawn-out deportation case came up in the Senate last week, where Conservative Senator David Tkachuk wondered how much longer it will go on. He also asked whether the Department of Citizenship and Immigration has conducted a review of why Zundel was not turned over to German officials, as they had requested, when U.S. authorities deported him to Canada.

Senator Jack Austin, the government leader in the Senate, responded by saying that Canada's system of laws is "balanced in favour of the presumption of innocence of the person who is the subject of the proceeding. The Crown has the obligation of demonstrating why he should be removed."

Austin said Zundel "has the right to the benefits of Canadian law, and he has the right to use our judicial process, and he is exercising that right."

Zundel was convicted in 1985 of spreading false news, and again in 1988 in a new trial. In 1992, the Supreme Court of Canada overturned the conviction and struck down the false news section of the Criminal Code as a violation of free speech.

UJA Federation launches $250 million development campaign

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Gerry Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum, chairs of the Tomorrow Campaign, a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto project, announced last week that $100 million of the $250 million needed to complete the project has already been raised privately.

The rest of the funds to be raised for the Tomorrow Campaign, being billed as the largest community development project in the country, will also go to develop facilities and programs, including community services, fitness, health and wellness, seniors, education, day care and day camps, in three parts of the Greater Toronto Area: Spadina Avenue and Bloor Street (the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life and the Miles Nadal JCC), Bathurst and Sheppard Avenue (on the site of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre) and a new campus at Bathurst and Weldrick Avenue in Richmond Hill.

At the launch, held at the Design Exchange, event chair Paul Godfrey, president and CEO of the Toronto Blue Jays, quipped that if his team could have the same lineup as the cabinet in the Tomorrow Campaign, it would be having a different season.

Among those present at the launch were Toronto Mayor David Miller, Vaughan Mayor Michael DiBiase, federal Minister of Human Resources and Skills Development Joe Volpe, and Ontario Finance Minister Greg Sorbara.

Tanenbaum, a native of Toronto, said that "this city is my life. I was born and grew up here, and if you are a Toronto resident, there is a 75 per cent chance that your children and grandchildren will grow up here as well."

Prior to unveiling plans for the City North centre in York Region, he noted that "the growth of the Jewish population in York Region has been nothing short of dramatic. It has increased 40 per cent in the last 20 years.

"The city north of Toronto is a crucial part of this campaign. It will serve residents [of all ages] and will revolutionize our vision of suburbia."

Schwartz, who was born in Winnipeg, said that he has chosen to make Toronto his home, and this is a chance for him to give something back to the city.

"We have all enjoyed the buildings that our forefathers have built for us, and this is an [opportunity] for this generation to leave something for our children and grandchildren."

In introducing the Centre Square project, he said the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre has been the heart of Jewish life for 40 years. "This ambitious plan [to redevelop and rebuild the centre] will be a celebration of community services and Jewish life. Our community's growth calls for a project of this ambition."

Miller said the Tomorrow Campaign is the most ambitious and complex project he has ever seen a non-profit organization take on.

"It is a model of community engagement that [any] city should learn from. It is designed to benefit all residents of the GTA."

Campaign, don't debase or degrade

A federal election is imminent. Of that, there is no doubt. Pundits are vying with each other to predict the day the writ will fall. Question period in the House of Commons has descended into deeper troughs of edgier nastiness. The parties have announced their election readiness. The roster of candidates is being filled out. And the leaders have all recently taken to making high-sounding pronouncements rather than engaging in plain-sounding conversation.

This will be the first election in more than a decade in which the voter will be choosing from among four established parties, fully three of which are bona fide, nationally viable parties. Only one party, the Bloc Québécois, is parochially regional. This will also be the first election in more than a decade in which each of the three national parties will be campaigning under the charge of new leaders.

Differences among the leaders are stark. Differences among the respective parties' philosophies of governing are also stark. Thus, so too are the choices. For that reason, we urge the parties to campaign on their respective policy platforms and to use the campaign as an opportunity to instruct, if not to educate, voters on essential policy differences.

We especially urge the parties to avoid "attack advertising," the particularly odious, ad hominem method of negative campaigning that has become so popular in recent times.

It is undeniably true that all voters cast their votes on the basis of a combination of factors, some of which will naturally relate to personal traits of candidates rather than to policy considerations of the candidates' parties. After all, our affinities towards candidates and parties can follow a path through the heart as well as through the mind. But by its very nature, with "attack-ad" negative campaigning, parties focus only on the individual. They do not put forward ideas; they point fingers. They do not help to perpetuate democracy-building values; rather, they smear reputations and tear away at the protective covering around one of the important pillars of decent, freedom-loving societies: the notion of respect for the other.

The harm occasioned by attack-ad campaigning is manifold. In the first place, voters are deprived a campaign that is issues-oriented and true to the requirements that civics and citizenship demand. In the second place, such a campaign merely adds to the cynicism about politics, distaste for politicians and distancing from the political process. Thirdly, and perhaps most importantly, negative campaigning sets a horrible example for the younger generation who see in the comportment of older generation politicians a standard of behaviour that society purports to abhor. The hypocrisy is too rich and too obvious to sustain.

We expect our politicians to campaign hard, but we demand that they not degrade each other and thus debase the entire process through attack ads or personal vilification.

Criticizes Sarner's views

Once again, CJN columnist Robert Sarner goes too far when it comes to his favourite pet prejudice against haredi Jews ("When the Sirens Wail," CJN, April 22). It seems that haredi-bashing is to some Israeli journalists what Israel-bashing is to the world media.

Recently, The CJN ran a brief notice about the publication of Natan Sharansky's excellent article, "Anti-Semitism in 3D." In it, he offered a simple three-point test that distinguishes between legitimate criticism of Israel and criticism that is anti-Semitic. The CJN would do well to print the entire piece. It is a very handy paradigm to have available in one's back pocket. I came across it in – lo and behold – a haredi newspaper. It's just what Sarner needs to reframe his contempt for haredim into points that can be debated with balance and perspective.

We all defend Israel as a vibrant democracy, and a hallmark of any democracy is a wide-ranging tolerance of dissent. If some army reservists can refuse to serve in the territories as a form of dissent, then haredim can ignore the sirens as a form of dissent, too. On Tisha b'Av, the traditional and halachically mandated day of mourning for tragedies throughout our history, haredi Jews unite with all religious Jews as they fast and sit on the floor in shuls throughout Israel. That other Jews don't join them has been described as disappointing or tragic and even painful, but I have never heard Sarner's term "repugnant" ever used in that context.

Grants would not make up for loss

In "Community seeks provincial funds for security" (CJN, April 22), we read that the government of Ontario is considering granting funds to the Jewish community to help with security arrangements in Jewish schools.

Before jumping for joy over this news, however, we must bear in mind that this is the same government that cancelled whatever provincial funding previously existed for the parents in our schools. They did this in the most damaging way possible, and to date have refused to consider any alternative way of remedying the inequities in the funding of religious education in Ontario.

The money lost from this cancellation without an appropriate replacement is far more than any security costs our schools might incur. One might wonder if, by being effusive in praise of the government for their consideration of funding school security, we as a community are acting in a way that is penny wise and pound foolish.

Looking for Rhodes survivors

The Rhodes Project seeks to interview and record on film Holocaust survivors and their descendants who were on the Greek island of Rhodes during World War II. The project has two stages. Interviews have already begun this year, and there is a rush to capture the remnants of that catastrophic event.

The summer of 2005 will include a trip to recreate the journey that 1,700 Jews endured when they went from Rhodes to the island of Kos to pick up more Jews and then to the port of Piraeus and the Haidari concentration camp in Athens before their final, long trip by cattle car to Auschwitz-Birkenau, where most perished.

If you are from Rhodes or a descendant of some one from Rhodes, please contact me by phone at 503-287-1358, by e-mail at jmenashe@charter.net or by mail at P.O. Box 333, Lake Hiawatha, N.J., 07034. It is important to accurately retell this under-told story of how the Sephardi Jews were taken off the island.

Time to rethink campus strategy

As a former student union executive and a full-time Jewish student at the University of King's College, I strongly agree with Joanna Cohen's article on campus representation ("Time to rethink campus strategy," CJN, April 22) and I would like to expand on it. What I find extremely troublesome is not the odd offensive comment that comes from either side, but how culturally polarizing this debate is. I do not feel comfortable attending cultural events that are organized by any of the Jewish student groups at my school because I do not feel represented by their politics. It seems militant support for the policies of Israel is somehow a prerequisite for engaging in Jewish life on campus.

When I mentioned my position at the King's Students' Union to a staff person at the Atlantic Jewish Council, he was dismayed that they had not heard of me before. Was it because he wanted to know a student leader who happened to be Jewish or was it because he wanted to know a Jewish student leader who could represent his organizations interests on campus? I got the impression it was the latter.

Some students are not prepared to be pawns in a political struggle; we will formulate our own opinions. A university campus is a place for political debate, but I will engage in this debate on my own terms. If Jewish student groups can learn to accept this, then perhaps they will be able to represent the broader interests of Jewish students.

Warsaw Jewish history

In Sheldon Kirshner's article, "Warsaw's Wartime Secret City Harboured Jews" (CJN, April 15), he reports on Prof. Gunnar Paulsson's groundbreaking scholarly book Secret City and says this intriguing topic, Jews residing in Warsaw on the Aryan side of the city, has not been comprehensively addressed.

In a conversation I had with Paulsson last year after a meeting where he spoke about his book, he mentioned that there are three volumes, called Arishe Papirn, by Michael Borvich, completely devoted to this subject. The problem is that the volumes, which were published in 1955, are in Yiddish and none of the work has been translated.

Out of interest, I purchased the books from the National Yiddish Book Centre. I translated the chapter headings and mailed them to Paulsson in the hope that they will be useful to him. I know he would like to find a sponsor to have Borvish's work translated.

10 Jewish communities in 10 new countries join the EU

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Fewer than 150,000 Jews live in the 10 new member states who entered the European Union on May 1. The Jewish population in these countries ranges from 100 or less in Cyprus and Malta to as many as 100,000 or more in Hungary.

Following are brief profiles of the communities in each country, with comments from local Jewish personalities on EU enlargement.

• Hungary:

Estimates of Hungary's Jewish population range from 54,000 to more than 130,000. About 90 per cent live in Budapest, where there is a full range of Jewish cultural, religious, educational and social welfare services.

The vast majority of Hungarian Jews are non-observant, secular or unaffiliated. Only 6,000 or so are formally registered with the Jewish community and about 20,000 have some sort of affiliation with Jewish organizations or institutions.

The dominant religious affiliation is Neolog, similar to America's Conservative movement. There is a very small Orthodox community made up of both modern Orthodox and haredi Jews.

Chabad maintains a synagogue and yeshiva. A small Reform congregation established in 1992 functions outside official Jewish umbrella structures.

"Federation-style organized Jewish life is dying around the world," said Agnes Peresztegi, who helped found a grassroots modern Orthodox congregation in Budapest several years ago.

"People give their support in a very different and much more personalized way than was the norm even 15 years ago."

However, she said, "there's a need, of course, for federation-style organizations. Certain community functions may not be run by a small organization. But the federations need to change, and I'm sure that they will learn to work with grassroots Jewish organizations in the long run."

A lawyer who has worked on issues of Jewish property restitution, Peresztegi said she expects EU enlargement to impact issues related to works of art looted in the Holocaust.

The European Parliament passed a resolution last year calling for the creation of Europe-wide restitution rules and the creation of a single European agency to arbitrate art ownership disputes, she said.

The European Commission will draw up a report by the end of 2004 detailing how to put the resolution into practice, Peresztegi said. It will come up with specific proposals on a common European cataloguing system on looted cultural goods and common principles on ownership or title, and will define the potential powers of a cross-border arbitration body.

• Czech Republic:

Some 3,000 to 4,000 Jews are known to live in the Czech Republic, but estimates of unaffiliated Jews run much higher. Hundreds of foreign Jews, including Israelis, also live in the country.

Ten officially mandated Jewish communities and a number of secular Jewish institutions come under the aegis of the country's Federation of Jewish Communities.

About half of Czech Jewry lives in Prague, which boasts a full and lively range of Jewish religious, social, cultural and educational options. Though Orthodox Judaism is the main religious orientation, Conservative Jewry is also officially recognized and Reform services are present as well. Most Czech Jews are not Orthodox or secular.

Tomas Kraus, the federation's executive secretary, says joining the European Union could have both positive and negative effects on the community.

"The free movement of people could mean enlargement of Jewish communities, not only from the East"– with new immigrants looking for better economic and political conditions – "but also from the West, as it is now in many cases of American ex-pats who have found new jobs and positions in Prague and other Czech cities," he said.

But anti-Semitism also could rise in the new member countries, Kraus said.

"Western European moods can influence the moods in eastern and central Europe," he said. "With the Czech Republic being maybe exceptionally pro-Jewish and pro-Israel [though not without anti-Semitism or anti-Israel sentiment], this could be a new phenomenon."

• Slovakia:

Fewer than 4,000 Jews are believed to live in Slovakia. The main communities – each with about 500 Jews – are in the capital of Bratislava and in Kosice, in the eastern part of the country.

Most Slovak Jews are non-observant or secular, but there is a range of cultural, religious and educational activity.

Maros Borsky, a curator at the Jewish museum in Bratislava, also runs a general-service travel agency. He says Slovakia's EU membership could have a range of effects on Jewish communal life – including the potential for an exodus of young urban professionals.

"If so, it means the Slovak Jewish community would be demographically decimated," said Borsky, who is in his early 30s. "Some young people will stay, however, because new investment will generate an economic boom in the Bratislava region in some professional sectors."

In the long term, Borsky predicted a merging of Bratislava and Vienna into one urban zone, with the development of high-speed transportation that might aid co-operation between the two cities' Jewish communities.

"However, this would only be possible once the Viennese stop seeing Bratislavans as poor relatives, but rather as a community with similar demographic problems," Borsky said.

In general, he said, "I would imagine a depopulation of some smaller Jewish communities and a growing trend to large urban Jewish centres – Berlin, Budapest [and] perhaps Vienna-Bratislava."

• Poland:

Poland had Europe's largest Jewish population before World War II, at some 3.5 million Jews.

Today, estimates of the number of Jews in Poland range from the 7,000 to 8,000 who are officially registered with the community, belong to Jewish organizations or receive aid from the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, to the 10,000 to 15,000 people of Jewish ancestry who have shown interest in rediscovering their heritage, to as many as 30,000 to 40,000 people with some Jewish ancestry.

The Ronald S. Lauder Foundation, a prime mover in fostering post-communist Jewish revival in Poland, runs the country's most extensive Jewish educational programs, including a day school in Warsaw with more than 160 pupils.

Writer Konstanty Gebert, founding editor of the Jewish monthly Midrasz, says EU enlargement won't directly affect Jews in the new member states, aside from the mainly positive way it will change the lives of the general population.

"In the long run, however, it will be instrumental in bringing all the continent's Jews together and helping them avail themselves of new opportunities, both through EU sponsorship of some community programs and through the implementation of EU laws," he said. "The main issue, however, is whether there exists a 'European Jewry' able to profit from the opportunity."

Gebert warned that "what might change is the relatively more balanced approach some new members, especially Poland, have taken on the Middle East conflict. As the EU attempts to integrate the foreign policies of its members, it can be expected the newcomers will more closely toe Brussels' line, [which is] markedly critical of Israel."

• Lithuania:

About 4,000 Jews live in Lithuania, most of them in the capital, Vilnius, where there is a Jewish school, a Jewish museum and a range of Jewish cultural activity.

Synagogues operate in Vilnius and Kaunas, but attendance is low. Chabad is active.

Historian Ilya Lempertas said he expects some positive changes from Lithuania's EU entry, but not in the short term.

"It's the implementation of new laws and regulations that counts," he said. "I don't see any immediate change, but maybe we'll see something in three to five years."

The most positive effect, he said, would be that of bringing Lithuania out of what he called its "corner" into the European mainstream.

"To me, the one thing that the EU can give us is broader horizons," he said.

• Latvia:

About 10,000 Jews live in Latvia, most of them in the capital, Riga, where there is a synagogue, an active Jewish community centre and other infrastructure for Jewish life.

Latvia is believed to have had the highest rate of Nazi collaboration in Europe and has struggled to confront its Holocaust history since gaining independence from Soviet rule in 1991.

"On the one hand, EU enlargement will be good for us Jews here, as it means we won't be alone in Europe," said Meijer Melers of Riga's Jewish museum.

On the other hand, he feared the economic consequences, at least in the short run.

"We think entry into the EU is positive, but we worry a lot, too, that prices will shoot up and approach European levels," he said.

• Estonia:

About 3,500 Jews live in Estonia, the majority of them in Tallinn, the capital. There are three small communities in other regions of Estonia.

About 60 per cent of the community arrived in Estonia after World War II and are not considered Estonian citizens. The majority of them today are elderly and need social assistance.

Under communism, most of Estonia's Jews became highly assimilated and often estranged from Jewish religious and cultural traditions. Community leaders regard their main goal as fostering a restoration of Jewish identity through cultural, educational, religious and social programs.

"A positive effect of EU entry can be greater communication," said Aleksander Dusman, chair of the 150-member Jewish community in Ida Virumaa county. "We already had good co-operation with the Nordic countries. I hope after EU entry we have a greater possibility for free travel, jobs abroad [and] communication."

On the other hand, he said, he fears his community might receive less aid from international Jewish organizations.

"And we still don't know how to apply for EU funds," he said.

• Slovenia:

About 200 Jews live in Slovenia. In early 2003, the community opened a synagogue in a converted suite of office rooms, received a Torah as a gift and officially installed a rabbi, who divides his time between the Slovenian capital, Ljubljana, and the nearby Italian city of Trieste.

The synagogue is the first to function in Ljubljana since Jews were expelled from the city in 1515.

In a statement issued by the European Council of Jewish Communities, Slovene Jewish community president Andrei Kozar Beck complained that Slovene Jews were "treated as a small, irrelevant community. We practically have no contact with the state departments and they rarely even answer our mail."

There is no serious anti-Semitism in Slovenia, he said, but warned that "tolerance toward Jews and other non-Slovenians has been recently decreasing. That is a consequence of a nationalistic crisis in Slovenia and the adjustment of the upcoming entry into the EU, which does not seem to be very pro-Israel."

"Our government and press associate Israeli politics with Jews all around the world," he said. "The general political atmosphere is pro-Arab and not very fond of us."

• Cyprus:

Only two or three dozen Jewish families live in Cyprus, all of them in the Greek sector. Community officials say Cypriot Jews, like their non-Jewish compatriots, are generally happy about EU accession. One official said, "It is always positive to be a member of a bigger, more organized group like the EU."

• Malta:

About 100 Jews of all denominations live in Malta. Ashkenazi and Sephardi Jews pray together in an apartment owned by the community. About half of Malta's Jews are Orthodox.

Community president Shelley Deutch Tayar told the European Council of Jewish Communities that Maltese Jews are generally well-integrated into mainstream society.

"The Jews on the island are very respected and very accepted by the many interest circles. Nobody cares what religion one is, just what one does," Tayar said. "When Malta joins the European Union, it will be a lot easier for Jewish retirees to come to the island."

All of Jewish history — in two minutes

I've just returned from a mission to Poland and Israel. Our group was left with one inescapable conclusion: Jewish history is a roller-coaster of horror and happiness. In Poland we saw piles of human hair and cans of zyklon-b pellets. In Israel we saw smiling schoolchildren and maternity wards. In Poland we saw cattle cars. In Israel we saw proud soldiers. In Poland we saw gas chambers. In Israel we saw new construction. Up close, Jewish history becomes an emotionally turbulent experience.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

The Israeli calender is even more chaotic. The day before Independence Day is Memorial Day.

Unlike in Canada, in Israel, Memorial Day is quite melancholy. Everyone attends a remembrance service, and the entire country stops when the sirens ring. When I asked our tour security guard, Amit, to say a few words about Memorial Day, he choked up with tears. He had served in a combat unit and lost friends in battle.

And then, immediately after this comes absolute celebration. As if by the flick of a switch, the entire country is transformed into one big block party, with revellers roaming the streets and families barbecuing in the park. In a uniquely Jewish fashion, we insist on commemorating tragedy immediately before celebrating independence. (Much like the Passover seder includes mention of both slavery and freedom).

This need to combine bitter and sweet memories together is at the heart of an authentic Jewish historiography. Jewish history consists of both exile and redemption. We don't view exile as meaningless historical time, something we'd prefer to forget. On the contrary, exile is carefully remembered. And this is the paradox of our history: we see exile and redemption, seeming polar opposites, as deeply connected experiences. And like all good paradoxes, it is meant to be a question that keeps asking questions.

This paradox teaches multiple lessons. It underlines the fact that Israel (and the Jewish people) continue to survive and thrive, despite our challenges. It reminds us that the manifold miracles of contemporary Israel, such as blooming deserts, the return to the Western Wall and cutting edge medical research, are expensive miracles. More than 20,000 soldiers have paid with their lives for these achievements. And it teaches us that we must continue to claim the moral high ground, unlike our tormentors.

At the end of Memorial Day, I was at a ceremony in which the Israeli flag, flying at half mast, was raised to full height. At that moment, I understood that I was experiencing all of Jewish history in two minutes. It's a history that lives at the intersection of exile and redemption, between half mast and full glory. It may seem an absurd way to look at history, but isn't it also absurd that this small, persecuted people has persisted in living on?

Israel, Happy 56th!

Balancing the joys and sorrows of being Jewish

Four days before Passover, in a session connected to Montreal's 1,000-person "day of learning" about Israel, I proposed that we leave one empty chair at our Seder tables to memorialize victims of terror. One mother asked, "Don't those kinds of things upset your kids?" "These are the realities of life," I replied. "My four children know about the sorrow of Israeli life. They also know about the joys. They have a full, multi-dimensional picture of Israel and Jewish life and can view this sadness in context."

Gil Troy in Montreal

Three days later, vandals torched the United Talmud Torah's school library. On the eve of the first seder, Montreal's Jewish children received an unwelcome lesson in the world's ugliness – one the criminals imposed following their own twisted timetable.

My 8-year-old daughter and 6-year-old son seemed less unnerved by the firebombing than many of their school chums. Their school is across town, but they discussed the attack in class and in an assembly, and they and their buddies contributed to the library rebuilding fund. Security also increased at our school – when we passed the closed building one Shabbat, my 3-year-old asked, "Where's the protector?"

Still, while responding to the horror, while contributing to the rebuilding effort, my children were not shocked. They processed news of the UTT crime in the context of the Palestinians' immoral turn away from negotiation and toward terror, and in the aftermath of Sept. 11 in a world where they have heard about suicide bombings, kidnappings of soldiers, anti-Semitism in France, and attacks on synagogues in Turkey and Toronto.

We don't shield our children from the bad news – but we have also steeped them in the good. My children have tasted sunrise over Masada and sunset at the Kotel, they have danced in the Shabbat with Birthrighters on the streets of old Jerusalem, and they have munched their way through the kosher McDonald's that are spread across Israel. They have frolicked on the beaches of Tel Aviv, played with friends at Neot Kedumim, where the Maccabees roamed, and dug for archeological treasures at Bet Guvrin. They speak Hebrew, delight in the Shabbat, and are learning Jewish values. For them being Jewish and identifying with Israel is a multi-dimensional, many-splendoured thing – with, alas, some dark spots too.

Moreover, the soldier we honoured at the seder – Benny Avraham, one of the three Israelis murdered by Hezbollah in October 2000 – looms large in my kids' imaginations. During the three years that Benny's fate was unclear, my children met Benny's parents and sisters, they drew pictures of Benny and for Benny while dreaming of his return. Yes, his murder saddened them – but they have also enjoyed befriending our new "family" in Israel, the Avrahams.

"I guess I would add Haim Avraham [Benny's father] to my list of heroes," my 6-year-old mused on Israel's birthday. "He's a very jolly man even though he lost his son." I don't know what pleased me more – that my first-grader grasped this lesson about living with and beyond tragedy, or that he has a list of heroes and role models who inspire him. The list includes many Jews who have triumphed over adversity, such as the warrior from the 2,200-year-old Chanukah story, Judah Maccabee; the great Torah commentator from Troyes, France of a thousand years ago, Rashi; and the short, bald, moral giant who stared down the Soviet Union 20 years ago, Natan Sharansky.

If you place yourself in the Jewish story, you will find heroes and villains, triumph and trauma. Unfortunately, we cannot shield our children from "bad news" – and if we try to, we cede the initiative in our children's education to the evil-doers, waiting for them to strike, then reacting. And we risk raising children who respond more powerfully to the negative than to the positive, who make anti-Semitism the driving engine of Jewish identity – rather than love of tradition or love of Zion.

I wish I could protect my kids from all evil. Failing that, the only way I know how to prepare them is to root them in a tradition, in a worldview, that is so rich, so complex and so filled with goodness and heroes that it can also be resilient enough to strengthen us all, young and old, for the challenges that will inevitably rise in today's world.

Travelling back to the depths of immigrant memory

This month inaugurates the expansion of the European Union from 15 member nations to twenty-five strong. Such a conglomerate entity would have been unimaginable during the Cold War years, and imagined only with dread during the late 1930s and early 40s.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Today, the global village brings all these nations into a closely woven web, and the far-off and exotic become close and familiar. Travel sections of major newspapers in Canada and the United States celebrate the new members with extensive feature articles, tempting would-be travellers with photographs of primordial forests and pristine seaside beaches, elegant hotels and sybaritic spas, regional cuisine and culture.

Amid the hoopla, it is hard to remember that fewer than 40 years have passed since the release of Sidney Lumet's stunning 1965 film The Pawnbroker. In a memorable scene, Sol Nazerman, a tormented survivor of Nazi atrocities, quashed the wanderlust of his rootless American niece and nephew by declaring, "Europe is a cemetery."

Today we live with an ever-shifting European map. Not only has Germany been unified, and Europe splintered into a multitude of small nations, but the continent now forms a united coalition, joining east and west. The castles and markets beckon.

For Nazerman, anguished memory made it obscene to view European travel as pleasurable. Like him, for decades many Jewish travellers avoided Germany as a vacation spot. With the fall of the Iron Curtain, destinations that were once difficult for North American wanderers became easier. Some Jewish voyagers permitted themselves trips to these countries, but only for sober pilgrimages to sites of Jewish catastrophe.

And now travel supplements brim with names that gurgle up like well-springs from the depths of immigrant memory: Lithuania, Poland, Latvia. Riga, Vilnius, Krakow, Bratislava, Prague, Budapest. Place names with centuries-old associations with scholars and rebbes and healers and storytellers, where Jewish cultural, religious and secular movements took off and flourished like nowhere else.

To be a Jewish tourist in Europe is to experience what the African American writer W.D. Dubois called "double consciousness" – a jarring vision of oneself, of one's people, as simultaneously both the familiar and the unassimilable "Other." One can admire the cultural treasures and become immersed in the long history of the continent, and at the same time feel the pinprick of Jewish history – the imprint of exclusion and demonization.

Last spring, I sat at a table in an outdoor café in the old part of Krakow. I was with a group of students touring Jewish memory sites. As I sipped coffee, I reflected that nothing had prepared me for the beauty of Poland: the lush countryside, the picturesque villages, the exquisite charm of the old cities. I had pictured the country in shades of grey and mud-brown. My family fled the pogroms of the early 20th century, and I grew up on stories of poverty and persecution. During the Shoah, the region contained unspeakable places of Jewish catastrophe. These formed my imagined Polish landscape.

When I was a university student, my family did not discourage the backpacking expeditions to Europe. Still, I understood that my elders would have agreed with the spirit of Sol Nazerman's assessment. This was true for all of Europe, but any place in Eastern Europe was beyond the pale. Before I departed for Krakow last spring, my aunts telephoned me to remind me that my ancestors would have sorely disapproved. Poland! In the Krakow café, I felt a momentary twinge of conscience for taking pleasure in a sunny afternoon and an espresso. Then it struck me that the beauty and pleasure, too, were part of the Jewish experience in Poland – something stolen, not freely repudiated.

The continent wants Jewish tourists. Local and national travel boards tout Jewish history and culture tours. And our roots run deep. The cognoscenti already know this. Disciples of a rebbe, scholars of the Haskalah, fans of klezmer have already cut the path of the pilgrimage that the casual tourist will walk.

So we will travel to these once far-off places, oddly empty of the Jews who once thrived there, speaking a babble of tongues. We will mourn the catastrophe and honour its victims, but also celebrate the richness of the Jewish experience that preceded it. For as surely as Jews are people of the Book, we are also people of pilgrimage.

The Kirshner File

Sharon regroups after referendum defeat

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was licking his wounds this week, scrambling to regroup and retool after the Likud party, in a non-binding referendum on May 2, overwhelmingly rejected his controversial plan for a unilateral Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip and four isolated settlements in the West Bank.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Although Sharon claims he respects the result of the lopsided outcome, which had been forecast, he has promised to push ahead. "I want to say in the clearest fashion there will be another plan," he declared last week, in an unmistakable signal to hard-line opponents that he has no intention of resigning and intends to pursue his vision of peace. Sharon, having staked much of his political capital on winning the referendum, will probably submit a watered-down version of the plan following consultations with cabinet ministers and members of his fractured party.

Speculation is rife that Sharon, in a bid to placate adversaries who bitterly oppose any withdrawals and reject the land-for-peace formula, will propose a limited and phased pullout from Gaza and a more modest withdrawal from the West Bank. Alternatively, he may opt for evacuating major Palestinian cities and towns in the West Bank, reoccupied by the Israeli army during Operation Defensive Shield two years ago. On the other hand, he may call a plebiscite or new elections. Whatever path he chooses, Sharon is beset by fierce internal and external pressures.

The 7,500 settlers of Gaza, living in 21 outposts in a sea of 1.3 million Palestinians, believe their cause is just, and will likely resist any plan that requires them to relinquish Gaza. In a reflection of their zealous views, Uri Elitzur, in Yediot Achronot, wrote, "The uprooting of settlements is an inhuman act."

Sharon, the godfather of the settlement movement and the prime mover of settlements in Gaza, thus finds himself in the peculiar and ironic position of having to engage in political combat with the very people who voted him into power, not once but twice. The settlers are astute tacticians, though far from brilliant strategists, and, judging by the referendum, they have the backing of six out of 10 Likudniks.

Sharon, having warned that a unilateral withdrawal from Gaza is preferable to an internationally-imposed peace agreement, thinks his plan is in Israel's long-range interests. But the Likud, officially on record as opposing a Palestinian state, is simply not ready for meaningful territorial compromise, the sine qua non of any durable agreement Israel might sign one day with the Palestinians.

Sharon is being squeezed by all sides. Far-right members of his coalition want him to honour the results of the referendum. But Yosef (Tommy) Lapid, the leader of the Shinui party, an important partner in his government, has urged him to come up with an abridged version. Lapid has threatened to leave the coalition if extremists in Likud gain the upper hand. "We are not here to save Sharon from the Likud, but to save the state from the Likud," he caustically remarked.

Shimon Peres, the Labour party leader, is leaning on Sharon, too. Peres, a proponent of fresh elections, has told him he will support only a full disengagement plan. "It is inconceivable that 50,000 people will decide the fate of 10 million," he said in a reference to the number of Likud central committee members who voted against Sharon's plan.

Sharon must also consider Israel's pivotal relationship with the United States. On April 14, in a historic letter, President George W. Bush endorsed the idea that Israel could retain territory in the West Bank as part of a final agreement and rejected claims that Palestinian refugees have a right to return to their former homes in what is now Israel.

Ariel Sharon votes in May 2 Likud referendum.

Bush's seminal assurances rest on the assumption that Israel with evacuate Gaza. But if Sharon cannot deliver on his promise, the United States may well revise its policy, notwithstanding a White House statement on April 29 that Bush stands by his commitments. In fact, a reassessment may already have begun. Last week, the United States joined the three other parties sponsoring the road map to peace – the United Nations, the European Union and Russia – in calling for a full Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and insisting that "unilateral actions" should not "predetermine issues that can only be resolved through negotiation and agreement."

The apparent reversal may have been influenced by a bluntly worded letter 60 retired American diplomats sent to Bush on May 4. Lambasting Bush for his "unabashed support" for Sharon, they asserted that his unilateralism bypasses the road map and undermines a negotiated accord. "By closing the door to negotiations with Palestinians...you have proved that the United States is not an evenhanded peace partner."

Striking a similar tone, Jacques Chirac, the president of France, said the question of final borders and the rights of Palestinian refugees should be resolved through talks. Otherwise, he noted, Sharon's plan was "doomed to failure."

The Palestinians, fearing that Sharon's advocacy of the plan is directly related to his desire to keep five settlement blocs in the West Bank, have generally panned it. Saeb Erekat, the chief Palestinian negotiator, has urged Bush to withdraw his most recent pledges to Israel and to revive the road map. And in an appeal to Sharon, he has asked Israel to return to the negotiating table. Sharon, though, has no interest in resuming talks with the current leaders of the Palestinian Authority, being utterly convinced they are untrustworthy and unreliable partners and are unwilling to crack down on terrorism. The views of the Palestinians are belittled by Sharon, but they carry weight at the United Nations and in the European Union and Russia.

In retrospect, Sharon bent over backwards to court Likud diehards in the runup to the referendum, realizing the outcome might be too close for comfort. Talking tough, Sharon, in a pre-Passover interview, said his plan would rule out a Palestinian state, at least for years, and "harm the Palestinians severely."

With an eye on far-right nationalist opinion within the Likud, Sharon said as well that Israel's response to Palestinian violence after a withdrawal would be harsher than ever. The targeted assassinations of Sheikh Ahmed Yassin – the spiritual leader of Hamas – and of his successor, Abdel Aziz Rantisi, on March 22 and April 18, plus Israel's repeated incursions into Gaza, left no doubt of Sharon's seriousness and resolve.

Sharon also went out of his way to reiterate that the disengagement plan should not be perceived as a reward for terrorism. For the settlers, this was a moot point, given their absolute determination to preserve the status quo at all costs.

Last but not least, Sharon's nullification of his pledge to Bush not to kill Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, was definitely meant to appease Likud hardliners.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, who said last week that settling Gaza had been an "historic mistake," also threw himself wholeheartedly into the the battle for hearts and minds in Likud. A certified hawk, he said Sharon's plan would improve Israel's political, economic and security situation and lead to the rise of Palestinian "pragmatic forces" with which Israel could negotiate.

As Sharon and Mofaz lobbied Likud members, there were two developments that seemed to bode well for the plan. The Israeli army announced that a trench would be dug alongside the Philadelphia Road, on the border between Gaza and Egypt, to prevent arms smuggling. Israel's director of military intelligence, Gen. Aharon Ze'evi, predicted that a withdrawal from Gaza would lead to a decline in terrorist attacks. (Two months earlier, Ze'evi acknowledged that the Palestinians would interpret the plan as a victory for terrorism).

Much to Sharon's probable delight but to the consternation of the Palestinians, Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu injected an ominous note into the debate by noting that the plan would enable Israel to "fortify our hold" on the West Bank and invest millions of more dollars in the settlements.

For all his efforts, Sharon's public relations campaign failed miserably. In an astounding rebuff to Sharon on the eve of the referendum, Netanyahu, Education Minister Limor Livnat and Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom refused to lobby for the plan after having grudgingly accepted it, while Agriculture Minister Yisrael Katz warned it would lay the groundwork, wittingly or unwittingly, for the total removal of all settlements from the northern half of the West Bank. And then, in a crushing blow, 300 militant rabbis identified with the settlements proclaimed that relinquishing Gaza and parts of the West Bank would violate the precepts of Judaism and endanger lives.

Clearly, Sharon miscalculated. He lost the referendum, patently unable to muster persuasive arguments on behalf of his plan, and he lost control of the Likud's strongest wing. Now what?

"I lost 49 lbs. Hypnosis put me back in control!"

49 lbs. lighter in 5 months

I had become overweight during my first year of college. My weight kept increasing from there. In desperation, I started dieting.

I felt starved and deprived. Once I stopped the program, I gained my weight back plus more.

I was easily insulted in those days. People told me, "You have such a pretty face." I knew what they meant: Too bad you're so fat.

I was desperate, yet I couldn't stop eating. I craved and binged. Every day I'd hide a sleeve of chips in my desk drawer.

Choosing hypnosis was the best decision of my life. When I'm full, I stop eating. I don't feel like I'm depriving myself. I don't fight it with will power. It's automatic. I lost an average of 10 lbs. a month, 49 lbs. in all.

I have not been paid to write this. I believe in hypnosis. It's given me my life back."

Yom Yerushalayim

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On May 19 (the 28th of Iyar), Israelis will celebrate the 37th anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem. Even if you won't be able to visit the city's holy sites this Yom Yerushalayim, you can visit its wonderful websites.

If you are only going to visit one Jerusalem website, make it the Jerusalem Archeological Park. This site complements the real park, which extends from the Temple Mount to the slope of the Mount of Olives in the south. The site has an interactive timeline of the city, models of the Temple area that allow you swivel the view 360 degrees, videos, maps, biographies of some of the city's most famous archeologists and much more [www.archpark.org.il/].

I have a question for veteran visitors to Jerusalem who think they've seen it all. Have you visited the Museum of the Seam? What about the Mount Zion Cable Car? I found out about those sites at the Gems in Israel website that highlights "Israel's lesser known tourist attractions and travel sites, the gems." The Museum on the Seam opened about a year ago to promote dialogue, coexistence and understanding between Israelis and Arabs and among members of Israel's varied society. The cable car dates back to the War of Independence when it was used to secretly evacuate wounded soldiers from Mount Zion over the Ben Hinnom Valley to safety at the St. John Hospital [http://tinyurl.com/2pd49].

If you've studied Torah, then you know the emblem of Jerusalem is the lion, the symbol of the tribe of Judah. A couple of years ago, the municipality of Jerusalem placed dozens of larger-than-life statues of lions throughout the city, each painted by a different artist. Dror Bar-Natan has captured those lions on film and has put them on his website. Take a tour of the city by lion [http://tinyurl.com/39fxq].

Although it may come as a bit of shock, residents of the Israeli capital don't spend their time commuting to work humming Naomi Shemer's Jerusalem of Gold (Yerushalayim Shel Zahav). They are much more likely to be listening to Galgalatz [mms://stream.msn.co.il/gglz] or, if they like classical music, dropping by the Jerusalem Music Centre in the beautiful Mishkenot Sha'ananim neighbourhood. You can listen to excerpts from some recent concerts at the site [www.jmc.co.il/]. If you would like to listen to Yerushalayim Shel Zahav, you can hear it at [http://tinyurl.com/26724] and read about the history of the song that a member of Knesset wanted to make the country's national anthem [www.jerusalemofgold.co.il/].

Looking for more on Jerusalem? Michael Zank has put together an annotated list of other Jerusalem-related sites. They range from apolitical to others that take very opinionated views of the city's past and future [www.bu.edu/mzank/Michael_Zank /jerusalem.html]. Also, check out the links Jacob Richman has gathered [www.jr.co.il/hotsites/i-jer.htm].

What would a visit to Jerusalem be without a visit to the Kotel? You can start off underground by taking Aish HaTorah's tunnel tour. The tunnel, which opened after a great deal of controversy in 1996, runs parallel to the Kotel and extends beneath the Arab Quarter of the Old City. This website lets you follow through the labyrinths while you read up on the underground (the site also promises an audio narration, but that feature wasn't working – at least not on the day that I visited) [www.aish.com/seminars/tunneltour/].

Once back on the surface, you can take a look at the Kotel – a live look. Thanks to a webcam, actually a "Kotelcam" trained on the holy wall, you can see what's doing in real time. The image is refreshed every minute or so [www.aish.com/wallcam/].

And what visit would be complete without putting a note in the Kotel? Jews traditionally leave notes – "kvitelach" – in the wall with requests for good health, prosperity or perhaps a shidduch. Now you can do it from anywhere in the world, via e-mail. Several organizations will print out your petition, fold it and insert it into the wall's crevices. Pirchei Shoshanim asks for a donation for delivering your note [www.westernwall.org/prayer.htm]. According to its website, the David Citadel Hotel offers a complimentary service [www.tdchotel.com/note_to_ kotel.asp]. What happens to your request after it's placed in the Kotel is anyone's guess.

Yom Yerushalayim samayach!

Timely wisdom from Pirkei Avot

By RABBI JOSEPH KELMAN

There is a Jewish tradition to study and read the chapters of Pirkei Avot (Ethics of the Fathers) from Pesach to Shavuot, but it is certainly appropriate to do this at any time.

Pirkei Avot is a section of the Mishnah considered so important that it has been included in our prayer book. While every aspect of the Torah and Talmud is important, this small volume contains very wonderful ethical insights that can influence our feelings and behaviour. Personally, every time I read or teach a chapter or verse of this volume, I am strengthened and encouraged to correct thoughts, actions and relationships.

In the fourth chapter, Ben Zoma, a great second-century scholar, asked four very basic questions and gives four unusual and wonderful answers. "Who is wise?" "Who is strong?" "Who is rich?" and "Who is honoured?"

"Who is wise?" Everyone can acquire wisdom and learn from "kol adam," from every and any person, Ben Zoma says. We can learn from people in all walks of life, old, young, scholars and streetwise.

"Who is strong?" Surprisingly, the biblical Samson, with his great physical strength, is not the example chosen. The Hebrew words describing the strong man is the "kovesh et yitzro," he who can overcome and master the temptations of life that can lead us astray. All of us are born with an evil inclination, yetzer hara, but we need to struggle and overcome it in favour of our yetzer hatov, our good inclinations. We need to be strong in resisting illegal and immoral activities for temporary gain and pleasure that in the end bring permanent harm and the loss of moral dignity.

"Who is wealthy?" One who is happy with his lot and is not jealous that others may have more. He or she does not feel compelled to keep up with the Joneses and does not begrudge another's happiness or lifestyle.

"Who is honoured?" Ben Zoma understands that we all want honour and wish to be respected. However, to earn respect, Ben Zoma says, give respect to others and people in all walks of life, since we can learn something from everyone.

I suggest that these four questions represent four stages of life. When we are young, we want to acquire knowledge and, after completing our education, the wisdom to be successful in our activities. Then, the second question reminds us that we should have the moral and spiritual strength to meet all of life's challenges as we get older. The third question addresses our need to acquire and finally be content with our own material blessings.

And no matter who we are, all of us, in the end, want respect, and rightfully so, but to earn it, we must also, by example, take the initiative to be respectful to others.

I invite you to consider how these questions and answers can enhance your own lives and fulfill the purpose of Pirkei Avot and Torah.

First Israeli-born female rabbi visits

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

Temple Israel, Ottawa's only Reform synagogue, late last month hosted Rabbi Maya Leibovich, the first Israeli-born female rabbi, for a weekend of learning and celebration before Yom Ha'atzmaut.

With 30 members of the congregation, including Rabbi Steven Garten, in Israel on a community mission, Rabbi Leibovich served as visiting rabbi for the remaining congregants and made a number of appearances in the city throughout the weekend.

Born into a secular family in Israel of Czech parents who lost most of their families in the Holocaust, Rabbi Leibovich came to religion late in life. A visit to her parents' birthplace led her to an exploration of her heritage and the Bible.

At the age of 40, already a wife and mother of four, Rabbi Leibovich returned to school to become a rabbi. For the past 10 years, she has been spiritual leader of Congregation Mevasseret Zion on the outskirts of Jerusalem, a congregation of 160 families.

In her Sunday afternoon lecture at the Soloway Jewish Community Centre, Rabbi Leibovich talked about the lack of women's voices in the Bible. In the sacrifice of Isaac story, for example, she asked, "Where is Sarah?" In such a dramatic and frightening episode, surely the mother would have been distraught, yet her feelings were not even mentioned.

Rabbi Leibovich offered her own interpretations of various biblical passages while acknowledging that not everyone would, or must, agree with her.

But, she said, women's voices in Judaism will benefit us all.

"We will enrich Judaism because it is a unique, different voice. It is time to hear it," Rabbi Leibovich said. "The male voice is going to become softer and more sensitive... when you think 'Ki m'Tzion teytzei Torah.' Part of that Torah will be Torat nashim [the Torah of women]."

Anti-Semitism has been a stranger to the Jews of India

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Unlike any other community in the Diaspora, the Jews of India have had virtually no experience with anti-Semitism in the 2,000 years they have lived there, says a Bombay native.

"India has an unbroken record of... hospitality to Jews," said Ann Samson, a founding member of Toronto's BINA congregation, which holds services for Jews with Indian heritage.

"The Jews integrated into the wider community, but they never assimilated," Samson said recently at Beth Tikvah Synagogue. Speaking as part of a lecture series on Jewish communities around the world, Samson used slides and video clips to illuminate her own history and that of the larger Indian Jewish community.

The absence of anti-Semitism was in large part due to India's Hindu majority tradition of accommodating other cultures, she said.

"Jews were never involved with any kind of conflict with any of India's religious groups," Samson said.

In fact, the first experience of discrimination for some Indian Jews was when they immigrated to Israel and faced some unwelcoming co-religionists, she said.

A former school principal, Samson traced the history of the Indian Jewish community to 730 BCE, though some scholars say it began after the destruction of the Second Temple.

The first Jews arrived as castaways caught up in a sea storm just off the coast of Bombay. They came to be called the Bene Yisrael.

In trying to protect their women from unwanted relations with the local religious groups, the Bene Yisrael adopted oil pressing as their profession, a menial form of work that would ensure they were relegated to "untouchable" status within the caste system of the Hindu majority.

A second group settled in Cochin around the fifth century.

"They were helpful to the [Hindu Raja] with financial advice... and he decreed a tract of land to them," Samson said, noting the area was named Jew Town.

Samson said this was unique in the Diaspora, as the Jewish community had an independent principality ruled by a Jewish chief, in a foreign country.

Beginning in the 1830s, Jews from Persia, Yemen and Iraq arrived in India, settling primarily in Bombay and Calcutta.

Country's Jewish population peaked at 29,000 during WWII

A final group was European Jews, mostly from Germany, who fled the Nazis.

It was at this time, during World War II, that India's Jewish population peaked at 29,000. After mass emigration to Israel, Europe North America and Australia, today's population numbers less than 5,000 in a country of nearly one billion.

Samson has mixed ancestry, with grandparents and other relatives who came to India from Iraq, Yemen and South Africa.

Her slide show included photographs of Jewish landmarks in India, including synagogues, cemeteries and the site of the Bene Yisrael's arrival.

The Paradesi or "foreign" synagogue was built in 1568 in Cochin and still stands today, with its lavishly hand-painted marble tiles imported from China and opulent silver and gold Torah covers.

All synagogues in India followed the Orthodox Sephardi tradition. There were no ordained rabbis.

"All prayers were led by knowledgeable lay leaders or a chazzan," Samson said.

India's first rabbi came with the introduction of Reform Judaism to the country in the first half of the 20th century.

Samson was married in the Magen David Synagogue, which was built in 1861 by the Sassoons, a famous Indian Jewish family.

Of Iraqi descent, the Sassoons were major benefactors of both the Jewish community and the larger Bombay community. Some family members were knighted by the British.

The Sassoons established trust funds for the synagogues they built, allowing the community to be free from charging congregants with membership fees. The Jewish day school they funded, which Samson attended, was free. Today, it is open to students of all faiths.

Samson said she tries to preserve her Indian heritage by teaching her family prayers and customs from her homeland, such as the henna, a pre-wedding celebration to ward off evil and ensure fertility.

"It is important to me for my kids to learn and be proud of their heritage," she said.

Survivors formed a club 'to create a family'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The song, We Are Family, could be the theme for a group of 23 survivors from Poland who came to Canada after the war and formed Club 10, a social group, but much more.

Most of them had no extended family, and many had young children. Over the years, the members' children, grandchildren and now great-grandchildren have become part of an extended family.

Of the 23 original members, there are now seven, all in their 80s: Fanny Berholz, Fela Hochman, Regina Kozlowski, Harry Kreitzman, Hanke Newman, and Mini and Isaac Peters.

On Mothers Day at the Borochov Centre, four generations gathered for a lunch to pay tribute to the original members, to share their memories of growing up as a family and support group, and to express their gratitude and love.

The club began in 1954, when Hanke and David Newman moved upstairs from Fela and Benny Hochman. Each couple recommended others and they began meeting at each other's homes every week.

"We were all looking for people [with whom] to start a relationship – to create a family," Harry Kreitzman told The CJN. "We met every Saturday night, had a full dinner and played cards."

He added that playing cards was only used as a reason to get together. They also helped each other in many ways, such as finding employment.

The group appointed Zalman Berholz as president and his wife Fanny as the first lady, says their son Harry.

"My father's job as president was to take calls on Sunday morning from those who had complaints about Saturday night," he said jokingly.

"Mr. Newman became the spokesman at family simchahs, and the Club 10 family always sat at table 1 or 2.

"We children felt like we were cousins – they were our aunts and uncles. Mr. Newman always began his speech with 'Dear family, friends and Club 10,'" Harry Berholz said.

Phyllis Rich, daughter of Regina Kozlowski, spoke of her memories of Jackson's Point. "We have wonderful memories of The Maples where many of the club's families spent summers together."

Although there were many sad occasions, she added, "looking back, our memories are filled with fun and laughter. We looked forward to our parents' meetings. There were no baby sitters then, so the younger children came along.

"The host family worked all week to prepare, and we, the children, would love to hear their stories and jokes. It was comforting for me and it was a wonderful feeling."

Marilyn Herbert, Fela Hochman's daughter agreed. "I have a cottage across the road from the place we went to as a child at Jackson's Point. The wonderful memories are the reason I'm there."

Her daughter, Adina Herbert, a student at the University of King's College in Halifax said, "I remember hearing many stories. When I think of my grandparents, I always think of this group."

"Although we had family here," Marsha Goldstein, the Peters' daughter, said, "Club 10 was also our family. Everybody became a great support group."

At the luncheon, May Bien, the Kozlowskis' daughter, presented a video made up of photographs of Club 10 activities over the past 50 years.

Club members stressed that Israel was always a primary focus. They often donated money to the Association for the Soldiers of Israel and other Israeli charities in honour of a simchah.

To mark their 50th anniversary, the members of Club 10 collected money for the David Newman Yiddish Fund at Bialik Hebrew Day School.

Rabbi stresses importance of interfaith camaraderie

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

If the pursuit of peace is to be realized, people of all faiths must be willing to learn from, appreciate and help one another.

That was the message expressed by Adath Israel synagogue Rabbi Emeritus Erwin Schild, keynote speaker at the recent 18th annual Neighbourhood Interfaith Dinner.

"We must signify our willingness to accept partnerships and companionship," said Rabbi Schild, speaking at Beth Tzedec Congregation before an audience of 400 people.

"The lamp that we carry into the new millennium should be the lamp that invites people to help each other."

It was that mantra of mutual responsibility that prompted the event's founders – reverends Roy Wilson and Rob Oliphant, and Bill Glazer, Hart Rossman and David Hart of Beth Tzedec – to initiate the dinner concept in 1986.

Since then, the event has grown into an annual gala, with 13 churches and synagogues participating.

At this year's dinner, the founding members were honoured before an audience that included canons, reverends, priests, rabbis, as well as Toronto city councillors Joe Mihevc and Michael Walker.

It was fitting that Rabbi Schild spoke about interfaith camaraderie. A survivor of the notorious German concentration camp Dachau, Rabbi Schild has returned to his native Germany several times to lecture Christian audiences on various Jewish-related topics.

In 2003, Rabbi Schild returned to Dachau, where he delivered a passionate speech at the Church of Reconciliation on human rights in the Jewish tradition.

"It was not very easy for me to walk past the grounds where prisoners stood," Rabbi Schild said. "I felt almost as if I was there again."

But Rabbi Schild said his turmoil was eclipsed by hope for the future after seeing an overflowing audience and droves of visitors, many of whom were children.

In his dinner speech, Rabbi Schild urged the interfaith group to expand beyond its Christian and Jewish adherents.

"We are only at the beginning of the job," Rabbi Schild said.

"[We need] the integration of not only Islam… but with non-monotheistic religions. We have to embrace them."

The rabbi said "theological modesty" will help "lead us on the walk out of the darkness of suspicion and mistrust… into the light of mutual trust and appreciation."

Though he retired from Adath Israel in 1989 after more than 40 years as the synagogue's spiritual leader, Rabbi Schild has been active in communal affairs and interfaith relations.

For his efforts, Rabbi Schild has received the Human Relations Award from the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews and the Order of Merit, First Class of the Federal Republic of Germany. In 2001, he was appointed to the Order of Canada.

That same year, Rabbi Schild wrote an autobiography called The Very Narrow Bridge: A Memoir of An Uncertain Passed, which recounts his life up until his entrance into the rabbinate in 1947.

Keeping with the theme of diversity, the dinner followed a multifaith service, as Canon Cheryl Palmer said grace and Shari Rossman, wife of dinner founder Hart Rossman, said the Hamotzi blessing on the bread.

European reporters and politicians claim Israel has a right to self-defence. But when Israel exercises this right through military operations and checkpoints, they complain.

"So what do they mean by the right of self-defence? There is a lot of hypocrisy here."

In an attempt to explain the prevalence of media bias in Europe, Meir said Europeans generally judge Israel through the prism of their former experiences as colonizers in the Middle East and elsewhere.

He added that Europe's burgeoning Muslim population not only creates anti-Semitism but colours attitudes toward Israel.

In a slide presentation, Meir said Israel's incursion into the Jenin refugee camp two years ago touched off a frenzy of slanted reporting. "The 'massacre' story was a big lie."

Jenin was a classic case of media bias that should be studied at every school of journalism.

Meir acknowledged Israel should have permitted reporters into the camp immediately after the first battle.

By refusing reporters access during the first week of fighting, Israel effectively was complicit in fanning false rumors about Jenin, he conceded.

"It was a mistake," he said, referring to Israel's media policy.

Meir suggested the European press is guilty of moral equivalence by equating suicide bombers with their victims.

Some newspapers go even further, he said, calling attention to a headline in La Razon – a Spanish daily – the day after the Sbarro suicide bombing in Jerusalem. The headline read: "Bush is worried: Sharon is preparing to destroy the Palestinian people."

Meir blasted The Independent, a London daily, for publishing a grotesque cartoon before last year's election in Israel in which Prime Minister Ariel Sharon was portrayed as an ogre feasting on a helpless child.

He wondered why Sharon continues to be "demonized" despite his support for a two-state solution and his willingness to dismantle settlements in the Gaza Strip and the West Bank.

Meir attacked Orla Guerin, a BBC correspondent in Israel, for writing a commentary in a British newspaper alleging Israel is not a democracy.

Tomorrow Campaign is officially underway

An unprecedented non-profit community development initiative

By DANIEL HOROWITZ

An historic chapter in the life of Toronto's Jewish community began last Friday as UJA Federation's $250 million Tomorrow Campaign – chaired by Gerry Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum – was officially launched.

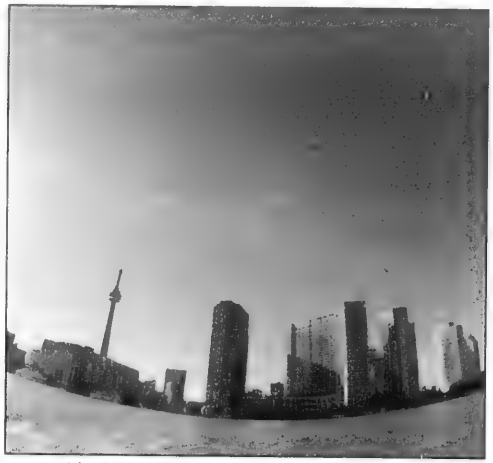
The Tomorrow Campaign is the largest, not-for-profit Jewish community infrastructure project in North American history, which will fund facilities, programs and services in three sections of the Greater Toronto Area – the downtown district, Central Square in the Bathurst-Sheppard area, and City North, on a 50-acre tract of York Region land. The programs and facilities to be provided cover health and wellness, hospital related services, education for children and adults, daycare, day camps, seniors' services and Holocaust remembrance.

"I applaud all those who devoted so much of their time and energy to make the Tomorrow Campaign a reality," said Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty. "This unique project – the largest Jewish community infrastructure project in Canadian history – promises to become a source of great strength, support and spirituality."

"From the visioning process right through to the nuts and bolts of business planning and architectural design, the Tomorrow Campaign is a true product of partnership, embodying the new face of philanthropy," said Leslie Gales, Chair, UJA Federation. "We started with a dream and are realizing it through a rigorous, diligent and partnered approach."

Also on hand at the launch at Toronto's Design Centre were Toronto Mayor David Miller, Vaughan Mayor Michael DiBiase, Ontario Finance Minister Greg Sobara, Joe Volpe, Federal Minister of Human Resources and Skills Development, and master of ceremonies, Paul Godfrey, President and C.E.O. of the Toronto Blue Jays.

"As one of the fastest growing, most dynamic and culturally diverse Jewish communities in North America, we have a unique and powerful opportunity to contribute further to this great city of ours, through this unprecedented, pioneering initiative," said Schwartz.



The $250 million Tomorrow Campaign is the largest Jewish community infrastructure project in North American history.

"The Tomorrow Campaign is more than creating buildings," said Tanenbaum. "At a time of intolerant acts, directed at our community and others, we are expressing confidence in our remarkable city and contributing to the well-being of the entire GTA. We are addressing some of the most critical issues facing Toronto today – health, education and culture."

"The Jewish community is playing its role in the renaissance of Toronto's cultural and communal infrastructure," added UJA Federation President Ted Sokolsky. "The Tomorrow Campaign speaks of our contribution to a city that has allowed our community to flourish. It's all about helping to build a great city, featuring world-class architecture, ethnic diversity, and public space for all residents to enjoy. The Tomorrow Campaign is a precedent-setting non-profit venture for public benefit representing the new face of philanthropy, a marriage of communal vision and philanthropic entrepreneurship."

Central Square will include a new and revitalized Koffler Centre of the Arts.

City North will be built on 50 acres of prime York Region land.

Tomorrow's leaders

The unprecedented scope and ambition of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign attracted two of Canada's most notable business leaders to chair the initiative - Gerry Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum.

Schwartz, a native of Winnipeg, is best known as the founder of Onex Corporation.

In addition to his involvement with UJA Federation, Schwartz is vice-chairman and member of the executive committee of Mount Sinai Hospital, and a director, governor, or trustee of a number of other organizations, including Junior Achievement of Toronto, Canadian Council of Christians and Jews, and the Board of Dean's Advisors of the Harvard Business School.

Gerald W. Schwartz

"I am not a native Torontonian," says Schwartz. "Just like thousands of newcomers before us and after us, we were generously and warmly welcomed here, and we are all proud to be called Torontonians. I was propelled toward the Tomorrow Campaign by this over-riding pride in a remarkable city. Together, Central Square, City North and the Downtown District constitute a bold new benchmark for Canadian philanthropy and community development."

Lawrence W. Tanenbaum

Sports fans know Tanenbaum best as chairman of Maple Leafs Sports and Entertainment Limited for which he serves as the governor of the Toronto Raptors and the Toronto Maple Leafs. He is also chairman and CEO of Kilmer Van Nostrand Co. Limited – and serves as chairman of Kilmer Capital Partners, a private equity investment fund.

He is involved with numerous charities including Mount Sinai Hospital, Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Schulich School of Business, York University, and the National Board of the Canadian Council of Christians and Jews. Tanenbaum also serves on the executive committee of UJA Federation and co-chaired the 1998 UJA Federation annual campaign.

Both Schwartz and Tanenbaum are founding chairs of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), Canada's preeminent advocacy organization on issues of urgent Jewish concern.

"I was born in Toronto; I grew up here," says Tanenbaum. "My parents built a home brimming with values in a city that valued what we stood for. Hard work and collective concern for people in need. This city allowed us to flourish and we have been active participants in its growth. That's why I'm so excited to be associated with this unprecedented undertaking. This is a campaign that will change the face of our Jewish community and the entire GTA."

A thriving Jewish GTA

Toronto is one of the world's largest Jewish communities outside Israel and one of only a few Jewish centres worldwide with a growing Jewish population. In barely one generation, the community has doubled in size to close to 200,000 people - 75% of whom live in or within 3 – 5 miles of the Bathurst corridor.

- Downtown District:

An estimated 21,000 Jews live south of St. Clair.

- Central Square:

The central section of Jewish Toronto runs predominantly, but not exclusively, east and west of Bathurst Street and north of St. Clair. This is home to approximately 90,000 Jews.

- City North:

York Region boasts 60,000 Jews, the third largest Jewish community in Canada - more than Vancouver, Ottawa and Winnipeg combined. It's also one of the fastest growing Jewish populations in North America. The push northward along the Bathurst corridor has brought with it unprecedented needs for the families, children, seniors and newcomers who make up our burgeoning Jewish population.

The Tomorrow Campaign

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has unveiled Canada's largest not-for-profit community development project – one of the boldest in North American history. Through the Tomorrow Campaign, UJA Federation, along with its community partners, will invest an unprecedented $250 million in three sections of the GTA, funding programs covering health and wellness, hospital related services, seniors, education for children of all ages, daycare, day camps and Holocaust remembrance. The three regions encompassed in the Tomorrow Campaign are Central Square, City North and Downtown District.

By EILEEN CHADNICK

City North

York Region is experiencing larger population growth than virtually any other North American urban area. Today it boasts 60,000 Jews, the third largest Jewish community in Canada - more than Vancouver, Ottawa and Winnipeg combined. It's also one of the fastest growing Jewish populations in North America.

To serve these growing needs, UJA Federation is developing a multifaceted campus on 50 prime acres of York Region.

City North, at the intersection of Bathurst Street and Weldrick Road, between Rutherford Road and Major Mackenzie, will be the site of a 21st century metropolitan experience. City North will feature beautiful indoor and outdoor public spaces, gardens, a ravine, courtyards, and streets that will serve as a shared backdrop for the 200,000 square foot Community Services Complex. The complex will house a diverse range of agencies, services and programs; the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT); elementary schools; and a Mount Sinai Hospital ambulatory clinic.

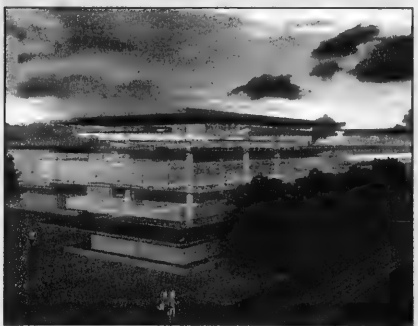
"We are now feeling the pulse of this community, which has responsed to City North with excitement and anticipation. We look forward to welcoming all residents of York Region to this outstanding facility."

-- City North Development Chair, Leo Goldhar

"The Vaughan Campus will benefit everyone, not only the Jewish population," says Vaughan Mayor Michael DiBiase. "I am so pleased to be a part of this ambitious endeavor."

The campus will feature a diverse range of family and social services, fitness and health programs, plus administrative and cultural agencies to ensure that City North becomes the location of choice for York Region residents. There will be a range of indoor and outdoor educational, camping, child care, sports, conference and meeting facilities for all ages.

City North is also working with a number of strategic partners to bring other world-class services to York Region.



City North will sit on 50 prime acres at the corner of Bathurst and Weldrick in the city of Vaughan.

Central Square

For over 40 years, the Central Square area, anchored by the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), has been the heartbeat of modern Jewish life in Toronto. Founded on the vision and tradition of caring for the Jewish community, it has provided cultural, social and community resources ever since Jews began migrating northward from downtown.

After four decades, the community spirit remains undaunted but time has taken a toll on the centre's physical infrastructure.

That's where the Tomorrow Campaign's Central Square comes in.

The new initiative is an ambitious, $100 million redevelopment on Bathurst, north of Sheppard, that will transform the BJCC site which also houses the Koffler Centre of the Arts, and the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services, by creating a state-of -the -art facility and a vibrant hub of cultural, educational, athletic, recreational and communal life. Situated in the geographic heart of Jewish Toronto, within a magnificent ravine setting, Central Square will be host to eight Centres of Excellence – each serving a distinct need and aspiration.

A New and Revitalized Koffler Centre of the Arts

A vibrant focal point for teaching, exhibition and performance, The Koffler Centre of the Arts will provide audiences with programs that enlighten and entertain.

The Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Learning

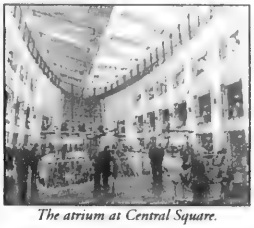
This facility will host a state-of-the-art multi-media educational resource centre and offer an extensive array of programming to invigorate Jewish learning and life.

The Centre for Collective Memory and Understanding

This centre will be a powerful resource that educates the community about the history and lessons of the Holocaust, memorializes those who perished, and offers a vibrant and active outreach and advocacy program that teaches tolerance and understanding.

"Central Square, through its bold architecture and innovative programming will showcase the best that our community has to offer and set a new benchmark for excellence."

-- Central Square Development Team Chair, Peter Cohen



The atrium at Central Square.

Children's Education Centre

Having established a reputation for excellence in the provision of early childhood education, the BJCC will continue to offer dynamic daycare and preschool programs - providing children with a "healthy Jewish start."

The Centre for Active Seniors

Dedicated to nourishing the mind and spirit of older members of our community, this centre will be committed to enriching the lives of its participants and promoting positive interaction among the generations.

Centre for Health, Wellness and Recreation

Continuing as a leader in this area, the BJCC will provide a comprehensive, holistic approach to health, wellness and lifetime fitness activities in beautiful new state-of –the-art facilities.

Centre for Celebration

The Centre for Celebration will be a fully equipped suite of meeting facilities and commercial services that respond to a wide range of community needs.

Community Services Centre

This centre will welcome each and every person who walks through its doors and embrace the services that it offers. Dedicated to caring for the welfare of the Jewish community, its programs will reach out to those in need and provide support services to families and individuals.

Downtown District

An estimated 21,000 Jews reside in downtown Toronto - south of St. Clair - making it one of North America's few growing Jewish communities in the city core. Today, the Downtown District serves more than 60,000 people a year – Jews and non-Jews alike.

The Downtown District is anchored by the new Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre at Bloor and Spadina and The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at Harbord and Huron. Together these two exciting projects – already up and running - are propelling downtown Toronto into a new era – building on the roots of Jewish culture while reaching out to the wider cultural mosaic of the surrounding community - bringing new vitality and vibrancy to the downtown core.

The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre is the sparkling new 65,000 square foot, $18 million structure replacing the landmark Bloor Jewish Community Centre (JCC) at Spadina and Bloor. Already, the Miles Nadal Centre is the new downtown home for athletics, health, wellness, arts, spirituality, education and culture. The Centre houses the new 350-seat, multi-purpose Green Family Theatre. It is also home to the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School.

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life

The $4.5 million Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life which opened in March, is the spiritual, intellectual and social centre of Jewish life on campus at the University of Toronto. Housed in a new 14,000 square foot building, the Wolfond Centre unites 4,500 Jewish students from U of T and welcomes the university community at large to experience the beauty of Jewish life.

These centres are serving as the cornerstones of Jewish life for the entire downtown Jewish community, and a bridge between all generations.

Leading U.S. peacenik coming to Toronto

Rabbi Michael Lerner, editor of the leftist Tikkun magazine, co-chair of the Tikkun community and a leading voice in the Jewish Renewal movement, is coming to Canada for the first time for two events this month.

The first is "Spirit Matters: Wisdom Traditions and the Great Work," from May 13-16. Hosted by the Transformative Learning Centre at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE), the conference will bring together a wide array of spiritual luminaries who will discuss and explore the teachings of over a dozen religions and traditions for the "wellbeing of the Earth community."

For details, contact Gayle Grisdale at 416-267-2185.

Rabbi Michael Lerner

The second event, titled "Building Bridges: Spiritual Politics and Reconciliation at Home and in the Middle East" is described as the first major effort of the Tikkun community of Toronto "to help to spread the Tikkun vision."

It takes place at the YMCA, 20 Grosvenor St., Toronto.

The gathering opens on the evening of May 15 with an address by Rabbi Lerner, followed by a musical celebration.

The next day will begin with the sharing of transformative stories, including by Rabbi Lerner. The rest of the day is to be devoted to workshops and activities on healing Israel/Palestine; spiritual politics; addressing the culture of fear; using religious celebrations creatively; and peace gardens/Earth spirituality. For information, call 416-762-5867.

There will also be a Tikkun Renewal Kabbalat Shabbat minyan on May 14 and a Shabbat morning Torah study and prayer session the next day.

Tikkun magazine has been described by the New York Times as "one of the most influential and innovative voices in American intellectual, cultural and political life," and the Tikkun community has been described as an international interfaith organization for peace, social justice and ecological sanity.

The Toronto chapter is billed as "a community inspired by a diversity of spiritual and social justice traditions and committed to tikkun olam, a Jewish belief in healing and transforming the world and ourselves. We work through the arts, politics and inclusive spirituality in a manner that is caring, creative, collaborative and fun."

Lawyers help feed the hungry at Osgoode Hall

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

For Elana Mayers, 15, sleeping late on Sunday mornings is a thing of the past.

Every week since September, Elana jumps out of bed and heads downtown to Osgoode Hall with her father Harvey, an optometrist, to help out at a brunch run by the "Lawyers Feed the Hungry" program.

The 10 a.m., one-hour brunch, which often feeds up to 400 people, mostly men, is one of three weekly meals – there is also a Wednesday dinner and a Thursday breakfast – funded by the Law Society of Upper Canada.

The program is the brainchild of Toronto lawyer Martin Teplitsky, who says that, after volunteering at an Out-of the Cold program, he decided lawyers should do something to help the homeless and people who don't have enough money to eat properly.

"We started with the Thursday breakfast, and then added Wednesday's dinner. Four years ago, we added the Sunday brunch."

On Sundays, guests are served juice and cereal, a hot meal, dessert and coffee or tea, and are then sent on their way with a bagged lunch.

Elana says she began volunteering at the brunch in order to make up the 40 hours of community service work required of Ontario public secondary school students over their four years of high school. She has long since made up those hours, however, and says she plans to continue volunteering every week.

She gets there each week by 8:30 a.m. to help set tables and prepare the bag lunches. "I know the guests appreciate what I'm doing. I couldn't just stop coming."

Although she only engages guests in small talk, she gets to know some of them, she says. "Ken, who has an extensive vocabulary, chooses to live on the street because he enjoys the freedom. Another man who always wears a fur hat likes telling me about his daughter.

"When Gord's glasses broke, my father figured out his prescription and made him a new pair. Gord is very happy with them."

Elana says she always wonders how the guests "have ended up where they are, but I never ask. I try to be sensitive."

Linda Pasternak, a lawyer who teaches law at Seneca College, started coming when her daughter needed her community service hours. "Our aim is to give the guests a quiet sanctuary. The food is good and the quality of service is good. The guests appreciate it."

One of her students, Jason Lewis, has also been coming out for about one year because, "I enjoy the camaraderie with the other volunteers, and I like the fact that I'm helping out."

Volunteer Carol Carson, has had a resource manual prepared for volunteers and guests.

"One family has a place to live but has no furniture. I was able to tell them where to find assistance. Another man was looking for work painting or cleaning eavestroughs. I gave him some ideas on where to look.

"We stay on the periphery. We never intrude on people, but we can't just serve them food and walk away. If they ask us something, we like to help out," says Carson, who also helps out at Holy Blossom Temple's Out of the Cold program and on Ve'ahavta's street van.

"We get as much out of the program as the guests. They nourish us, as well. Many of them have told us that we are the only stability they have," she says.

Mike, a regular guest, says that "Carol brightens our day. She makes us feel part of her family."

Michael Bronskill, a medical physicist, and his wife Patricia started volunteering about 3½ years ago when their son David, then a law student, "dragged us down.

"Now, we're all here every week. Its a family thing. A volunteer organization is like a delicate flower. It has to be fed."

Teplitsky says volunteers don't have to sign up.

"Whoever comes, comes. We trust in God, and volunteers are always there."

Architects changing the face of Jewish Toronto

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Susan Friedrich and Guela Solow-Ruda are the two architects responsible for the changing face of Jewish Toronto's south and north ends.

Friedrich designed the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, which opens officially this month. The 12,000-square-foot building, which will be part of the annual Doors Open Toronto event on May 29 and 30, is the new home of Hillel of Greater Toronto and serves 4,500 Jewish students through Hillel at the University of Toronto. It is located on Harbord Street, just west of U of T's Robarts Library.

Solow-Ruda is responsible for the Vaughan Jewish campus, like the Wolfond Centre one of the main projects of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, an initiative of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Its fundraising campaign, known as the Tomorrow Campaign, was launched last week. The multi-purpose complex bounded by Bathurst Street, Rutherford Road, Dufferin Street and Major Mackenzie Drive in Richmond Hill, is slated to include Jewish schools, agencies, residential, health and other facilities. The groundbreaking for its first building, the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, is scheduled for March 2005, with the school expected to open in Sept. 2006.

Both Friedrich and Solow-Ruda, as children of Holocaust survivors, derive a particular personal satisfaction from their involvement in these projects.

To Susan Friedrich, who immigrated to Canada in 1966 at age 6, designing the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life – headquarters of Hillel of Greater Toronto and new home base for Hillel at the University of Toronto – felt like a "once in a lifetime" opportunity.

Susan Friedrich

"The reason the project is so exciting for me is that I'm a child of survivors," said the Toronto-based architect, who was born in Romania to Hungarian parents. "We lost the majority of our family, so the opportunity to build something like this for students and for future generations is a dream project."

Friedrich's 2,000-square-foot storefront office, where she heads a staff of six, overlooks a modest multicultural retail streetscape on St. Clair Ave. W., east of Christie Street. The narrow, two-storey space is naturally lit by a skylight above the open staircase. A distinctive free-form steel railing, which served as a conceptual prototype for the one Friedrich designed for the Wolfond Centre, borders the stairs.

In the new building, the staircase running from the main floor student lounge to the basement multi-purpose room – which can accommodate 150 for Shabbat dinner – has a cobalt blue railing made up of fan-shaped spokes. Like the railing in Friedrich's office, it allows natural light to pass through. With its bold colour that alludes to the Israeli flag repeated on select walls, it is what Friedrich calls a unifying element.

Aside from its colour and openness, there is nothing particularly symbolic about the railing, but there are many overt (and less overt) references to Jewish tradition elsewhere in the 12,000-square-foot building.

The skylit canopied entrance, for example, subtly echoes the design of the Hebrew letters that form the word "chai" (life). Jerusalem stone was used both inside and outside the building, and a wooden pergola, serving as a second-floor sukkah deck outside a spacious naturally lit study room, recalls the wooden roofs of traditional eastern European synagogues.

"But," says Friedrich, "the truth is, there's no such thing as Jewish architecture," particularly when it comes to buildings that are not synagogues. Jewish buildings typically reflect the indigenous architecture of their location, she noted.

To bring in Jewish symbolic elements, Friedrich did "a lot of research."

Her mandate included creating a building that would be a symbol of Jewish pride, as well as a landmark and at the same time a welcoming place for students, faculty and members of the community.

One of the features that expresses what Friedrich calls "a homey kind of quality" is the three-sided fireplace in the main-floor lounge. In addition, she notes, the image of fire is often used as a symbol in Jewish buildings and art, to commemorate the eternal flame.

An alumna of the University of Waterloo, Friedrich completed her architecture studies in 1983 and has devoted much of her career to educational facilities and special needs buildings including non-profit and barrier-free housing, a group home for autistic adults and several women's shelters.

An active member of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's real estate cabinet for at least 15 years, Friedrich will be among the recipients of the organization's Shem Tov award in June for volunteer service in the community. She was nominated by the Kehilla Residential Programme, where she serves on two affiliated boards. She has also won awards for her professional work.

In the past 20 years, however, Friedrich has never designed anything quite like the Wolfond Centre. Although there are several such buildings at Ivy League universities in the United States, to the best of Friedrich's knowledge, the Wolfond Centre is the first purpose-built Hillel House in Canada.

Architect says JTT project like 'building a little city'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

It's not an exaggeration to say that the 50-acre "campus" being planned in York Region as part of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's three-pronged Jewish Toronto Tomorrow (JTT) project is unprecedented.

JTT, which was announced in 2000, has already wrought major changes in the downtown core, with the renovation of the Miles Nadal JCC at the corner of Bloor Street and Spadina Avenue, and the building of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, which has its official opening this month. Its second focus, the site of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and the Lipa Green building is also scheduled for a major redesign, with a new building in the works to replace the current JCC and Leah Posluns Theatre.

But the 50-acre campus bounded by Bathurst Street, Rutherford Road, Dufferin Street and Major Mackenzie Drive in Richmond Hill, represents the biggest change for the Greater Toronto Area, with its innovative, multi-faceted design that will include schools, agencies, child-care centres, residential and fitness facilities in a pedestrian-friendly setting that will incorporate elements of nature.

"It's sort of like building a little city," said Guela Solow-Ruda, the award-winning architect behind the plans. Of almost 200 Jewish communities in the federation system, approximately 30 have such campuses – among them the Asper campus in Winnipeg – although they don't have the same type of outdoor public space that is being planned here, she said.

Solow-Ruda – a partner in Petroff Partnerships Architects whose previous projects include the Apotex Centre at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and two renovations at Adath Israel Congregation – works in the firm's downtown office, a light-filled former warehouse with exposed brick walls and ample open space. The building serves as the firm's non-profit branch. Its Markham branch is geared to commercial clients; a third office is in Shanghai.

Guela Solow-Ruda

The campus project, said Solow-Ruda, is "really about creating a place for ordinary Jewish life. It's not about the production of an architectural masterpiece."

But the plans – particularly those aspects reminiscent of European arcades in London, Milan and Lyon – elicited many oohs and aahs from an audience of York Region residents seeing it for the first time at a launch event last November.

The York region area that the campus will serve has a Jewish population of 60,000, third in Canada only to Toronto and Montreal.

Solow-Ruda's initial concept was limited to what would fit in the designated space – "a standard exercise," she said.

But when Ted Sokolsky, now president of the federation, told her that the organization wanted to build a community, "it threw the urban design door wide open to us," said Solow-Ruda.

Patricia Tolkin Eppel, the federation's director of planning for York region, explained that when a child goes to play basketball on the new campus, "in our minds, he's going in to build community."

Solow-Ruda noted that the involvement of federation staff and a 12-member steering committee is one of the "really exceptional" aspects of the project. "Usually there's more of an arms-length relationship between the visionaries and the doers."

With Sokolsky's vision in mind, Solow-Ruda and her team began to research sites in Europe, North America and Israel, taking note of "what kinds of public rooms foster community life, a sense of civilization and identity.

"We looked at urban examples [like Boston's Faneuil Hall] and tried to make them have meaning for everybody in the community from elderly to newborns, the more fortunate and the less fortunate."

"There's nothing of this scale in the Toronto area," said Solow-Ruda.

A graduate of the University of Toronto in 1985, Solow-Ruda did part of her training in Florence. A child of Holocaust survivors with no extended family in Canada, the Toronto-born architect – who has relatives in Europe, Mexico, Israel and the United States – said she feels at home in many cities. She believes her family background has given her "a kind of global vision. I think the experience of the Holocaust really does colour how you look at the world."

The Vaughan campus project is very dear to her heart, she said. All projects that are "for a cause" have an ephemeral goal, she explained. In this case, the goal involves "enhancing Jewish life and ensuring the continuity of Jewish life in Toronto."

The project materials – in this case stone, and steel and glass – represent "our ancient roots" and "our future and our optimism" respectively.

"A good piece of architecture reads on many levels," said Solow-Ruda. "We want it to speak to the whole community."

Canadians ride for Reform Judaism in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Sharon Sobel figured that participating on a five-day fundraising bike ride in Israel would be a great way to support the country's Reform movement, but she didn't realize just how challenging an experience it would be.

"I thought it would be a great way to raise awareness of the Israeli Reform movement – and a great way to go and physically support the work they do," she said. The executive director of ARZA Canada, the Zionist arm of Reform Judaism, also raised the most money of the 20 Israeli and North American participants, about $16,000 (Cdn).

Rabbi Sobel, one of four Canadian participants, is a fitness buff and avid cyclist but wasn't prepared for the kind of off-road biking she did on the 350-km first annual Bike Ride for the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism (IMPJ), held in late March to raise money for the movement's schools and educational programs in Israel.

"The first day we had 12 river crossings," Rabbi Sobel recalled of their route from Nahariya to Jerusalem. "We had to walk across the river with our bikes."

Referring to the rocky and steep terrain the cyclists encountered, Rabbi Sobel admitted that she "would have been more comfortable on a paved surface.

An additional challenge was a fall on the second day that left her knees, shin and arm badly bruised and scraped but did not deter her from continuing.

Among the Canadians who took part in the bike ride was Rabbi Sharon Sobel and (inset) Stephen Wise.

In fact, fellow Canadian Noah Spector, a 24-year-old mountain bike instructor at the Reform movement's Camp George for the past three years, may have been the only participant not to fall.

A recent bachelor of social work recipient from Carleton University and a grade 8 and 9 teacher at Ottawa's Temple Israel, Spector said he considered the level of the ride intermediate to advanced.

Spector, who raised $2,500, trained over the winter in large part by doing cardio-related exercise like cross-country skiing, only getting back on his bike a week before the event.

The sense of community he saw in Reform schools in places like Modi'in and Mevaseret Zion was a particularly striking aspect of the trip, he recalls.

The cyclists also visited some of the 12 Reform congregations in Israel, but the best part, according to Rabbi Sobel, was the opportunity for North Americans and Israelis to spend time together.

She said that "you would not have known you were in a country going through turmoil," despite the assassination on the second day of their trip of Hamas leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin. Even riding through Arab villages, Rabbi Sobel said, people were "so supportive."

Stephen Wise, a Toronto native now in his fourth year of rabbinical studies at Hebrew Union College in New York City, took part because he wanted to raise funds for and awareness about the Reform movement in Israel, and also to see a different aspect of the country. Coincidentally, Rabbi Sobel served at his synagogue, Holy Blossom Temple, when he was growing up.

Surprisingly, Wise doesn't even own a bike. "I guess I didn't really think it was going to be that hard," he said, referring to his generally good fitness level. But, he added, it was only by the fourth or fifth day that he was able to ascend the mountains without stopping to walk for a bit.

He would "definitely" take part again. "It was pretty remarkable," he said.

"Sometimes people get the feeling that Reform in Israel is mostly North Americans, and that [native] Israelis are either Orthodox or secular," said Wise, who raised about $4,500 (US). He was "pretty impressed" by the number of Israelis on the ride and the Israeli children he saw in Reform nursery schools.

Rabbi Sobel noted that Israeli parents are looking for ways to give their children "a spiritual upbringing, but not from an Orthodox perspective." The Reform movement, she said, is becoming a viable option.

Funny, you don't look Jewish Community no longer only white and Ashkenazi, panel says

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Since 1984, when the Israeli government airlifted jets full of Ethiopian Jews, the landscape of Jewish faces has changed, says Rabbi Jordan Cohen, associate director of Kolel: the Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

Speaking at the launch of a recent three-week series titled "Funny, You Don't Look Jewish," Rabbi Cohen said that no longer is a gathering of Jews dominated by white, Ashkenazi faces. "The racial diversity of a Jew is ever more prevalent in our society."

Also on the panel was Hamilton physician and convert, Dr. Tony McFarland, who is originally from Jamaica, and Claudette Edgehill, a native of Guyana who converted to Judaism in 1996.

"Through conversion, adoption, immigration and contact with Jews from previously remote communities around the world, it is becoming increasingly more obvious that Jews can came from any culture or nationality," Rabbi Cohen said.

"Jews of colour, and multicultural Jewish families, [however] still face unique challenges of integration in the Jewish community," he said.

Having worked and lived for three years among the Jewish communities of Asia, Rabbi Cohen said that he counselled many Asian women who converted to Judaism after becoming involved with Jewish men, as well as a number of North American families who adopted Asian children.

Linda and Jeffrey Cutler with their daughter Shoshana Kayla Shifeng.

"[With children], the question becomes 'How do I raise my child to identify and appreciate Judaism, but at the same time learn about the heritage given to them at birth?'

"The questions are enormous, and the answers are only starting to flow out," he said.

Among those trying to deal with this issue are Linda and Jeffrey Cutler, who last summer adopted a daughter, Shoshana Kayla Shifeng, from China.

The Cutlers, who also have two special needs children ages 9 and 7, wanted to find a way for their new baby to grow up comfortable being Jewish, so they decided to contact other parents.

With the help of Rabbi Reuven Tradburks of Kehillat Shaarei Torah Congregation, they started an e-mail list, and they had about 28 responses to an ad in The CJN's What's New column about a Chanukah party.

They have since formed the Jewish-Asian Society. "We know that our daughter may have some issues, but meeting other people from multi-racial families will help. We do not want her to feel isolated," said Linda, a family physician.

They want their daughter to learn about her roots, said Jeffrey, a lawyer who is now on parental leave. "That is who she is. She is also Canadian and Jewish. She is a blend of three cultures. Our challenge is to help her with her identity."

McFarland says it is important to him to blend his birth culture with his identity as a Jew, and each year he goes to Jamaica to celebrate the High Holy Days.

Edgehill said that when she emigrated from Guyana, she babysat for a Jewish family and helped them celebrate Shabbat each week. "That was my opening to Jewish life, I got so involved in the ritual that I began learning more about it. I eventually studied at Adath Israel Congregation.

"I cannot put into words why I did it, but the congregants opened their arms and welcomed me. I am blessed to be in such a synagogue."

We all have barriers around us to protect ourselves, said Rabbi Cohen, "but sometimes [those barriers] get in the way of looking at who can be a Jew."

Peace is possible, says former Shin Bet head

Ayalon, who commanded the Israeli navy from 1992 to 1996 before his tenure at Shin Bet, chuckled when asked whether the Palestinian national movement accepts Israel's existence as a Jewish state.

"Most Israelis believe the Palestinians want to throw them into the sea. But most Palestinians believe the Israelis want to throw them across the Jordan River."

Ayalon said the majority of Palestinians realize israel is here to stay, accept the Jewish state and know Palestinian refugees cannot settle there under a "right of return."

The People's Voice calls for Palestinian refugees to be settled in a demilitarized Palestinian state and for Jerusalem to be the capital of both states.

It is aiming to create grassroots momentum for a permanent agreement between Israel and the Palestinians through a signature campaign to induce politicians on both sides to settle the Arab-Israeli dispute.

So far, 180,000 Israelis and 140,000 Palestinians have signed.

"We hope to collect as many signatures as possble," said Ayalon. "The signatures are only a tool to create interest among politicians. We don't know how many signatures would be necessary to gain their attention. But if we get 500,000, it'll be great."

He said The People's Voice already has had an effect.

"I know they're influenced by what we're doing," he said in a reference to Israeli cabinet ministers. "I think we are very influential and could be even more influential."

Asked to substantiate his claim, Ayalon spoke of Deputy Minister Ehud Olmert's proposal for a unilateral redrawing of Israel's borders, an idea that has morphed into Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's plan for a withdrawal from the Gaza Strip .

> 'Palestinians will have to fight the forces of terrorism and Islamic fundamentalism'

"If someone had told me 12 months ago that Olmert would say something that comes very close to our initiative, a withdrawal to more or less the 1967 border, I would have said, 'You're crazy.'

"And if someone had told me that Silvan Shalom, our foreign minister, would say he supports a unilateral withdrawal, and a two-state solution, I would say, 'It's a dream.'"

Recent surveys show that upward of 70 per cent of Israelis and a lower percentage of Palestinians are in favour of the initiative, he said.

He said most Israelis refer his initiative to Yossi Beilin's Geneva accord.

"Geneva is perceived as an attempt by the left to regain political power and replace the present government. We're perceived as a non-partisan and civil society movement that deals with the future and the concerns of both sides."

Asked whether he agrees with Sharon's working assumption that Israel has no Palestinian negotiating partner, Ayalon replied, "We're not saying the current Palestinian leadership is reliable. To create a reliable partner, we have to start people-to-people talks. Then Palestinians and Israelis can influence their respective leaders."

Asserting it is not his business to pass judgment on the current crop of Palestinian leaders, Ayalon said, "I'm looking for a Palestinian leadership that can agree with our views. It's for the Palestinians to choose their leaders. But personally, I think Arafat has failed as a leader."

If a mutual peace agreement is to endure, he said, the Palestinians will have to fight the forces of terrorism and Islamic fundamentalism.

"Otherwise, we won't get security."

About a quarter of Jewish settlers in the West Bank and Gaza Strip will have to be brought back to Israel if a peace agreement is signed, Ayalon said.

A land exchange should be based on the precepts of security, demography and territorial contiguity, he added.

Sharon's plan for a unilateral withdrawal from Gaza is problematic, Ayalon said, adding, "It's not a plan, but simply one move. It's a plan only if we know where it will lead us. What's the destination?

"Whether it will lead to stability and a political process, or greater violence, is an open question."

Ayalon said he could support Sharon's plan if it is consistent with the internationally-sponsored road map peace plan and his vision of a settlement.

He said he did not know whether Sharon's ulterior motive is to trade Gaza for the West Bank.

"I've known Sharon for about 35, 40 years, and he's been successful in hiding what he wants," he said. "The role of leadership is to tell the people where they are being led.

"This has been the failure of our leadership in the past 10 years."

But Ayalon thinks Sharon is ready for a two-state solution.

"He understands this will be the future. He told us many years ago, 'There is a Palestinian state and let's discuss the borders.' He's pragmatic."

Two York U students disciplined

Two students have been disciplined in response to the March 16 clash between pro-Palestinian and anti-terrorist student activists in Vari Hall at York University.

York has expelled student activist Dan Freeman-Maloy for three years for repeatedly breaking university rules. Freeman-Maloy was one of the organizers of an unauthorized protest inside Vari Hall where students clashed during a checkpoint presentation (see "Pro and anti-Israel groups clash at York U," The Canadian Jewish News, March 25).

The event led to a one-week suspension of the activities of three campus groups including Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, Hillel@York and Generations, a pro-Israel group.

Another student, Uri Nachim, is facing a hearing within the university for his participation in the day's events. This was Nachim's first offence.

University spokesperson Nancy White said Freeman-Maloy received several warnings verbally and in writing after he participated in an October 2003 anti-Israel Defence Force demonstration. Despite the warnings, he participated in the unauthorized, disruptive protest inside Vari Hall last month, she said.

"The expulsion cannot be appealed within the university," White said.

Hillel celebrates student accomplishments

By FRANCES KRAFT

Almost three dozen students representing various Toronto campuses, along with an administrator from Ryerson University, were honoured last Thursday at the first-ever student awards night to be held at the new Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life.

The centre, which opens officially May 13, is "physical evidence that the community is invested in our students," said Agi Mandel, new president of the Hillel of Greater Toronto board.

"All of us here are well aware of the rise of anti-Semitic activities across our beloved country, in our cities and in the... campus communities," said honoree Leatrice Spevack, campus groups administrator at Ryerson University.

Spevack, who received a Founding Friend of the Campus award, said it was heartening that Jewish students were not only running for campus government positions but winning elections.

"It is our duty to support them and to encourage others to follow in their footsteps," she said. "The only way we can influence decisions and policy is by being part of the body that makes them."

She urged students not to "fall for" a double standard that holds them, "as the world holds Israel," to a higher standard, when they "respond in kind" to Israel-bashing.

Student awards specific to individual campuses went to Jonathan Krebs, David Goldberg and Alana Weinberg at Ryerson; Isaac Apter, Greg Bloch, Ya'el Santopinto, Lauren Parl and Lia Katz at the University of Toronto; Eric Levin, Adam Hummel, Lydia Mankovsky and Ariela Fuerstenberg at York University.

Other awards were citywide: Naomi Gryfe received UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's community engagement committee Award for Enhancing Jewish Identity and Continuity; Marissa Verskin, Jenny Herbert, Zvi Halpern and Shoshanna Lockshin, the Schwartz Family Award for Tzedek and Social Justice; Aliza Libman, The Canadian Jewish News Award for Communication; Daniel Heller, the Sidney Mendick Memorial Award for Building Pluralism and Diversity; Shira Zeliger, the Gropper Family Award for Outstanding Leadership; Sarah Nasser, Yaakov Roth and Jamie Garnet, the Paisley Manor Insurance Brokers Inc. Award for Special Involvement in Jewish Campus Life; Doron Berger and Michelle Landy, the Nechama and Ya'akov Kainer Award for Creative Programming; Jonathan Moshevich, the Lapowich Family Award for Israel Advocacy on Campus; Tova Sasson, Hillel of Greater Toronto's Award for Ongoing Commitment to Jewish Student Life; and Jordie Saperia, Alex Green, Victor Volfson, Daniel Steinberg and Gila Sasson, Hillel of Greater Toronto's Hadracha Award.

The awards exemplify the students' work, commitment and interest, said Zac Kaye, Hillel's executive director.

Workshop helps Israel advocates reach Canadians

By CARMI LEVY
Special to The CJN

LONDON — The Canada-Israel Committee's recent Israel advocacy workshop at the Jewish Community Centre has made its participants better equipped to deal with anti-Israel sentiment in the general public.

The London workshop, which taught participants how to craft effective pro-Israel messages for the general public, was part of a cross-Canada series initiated by the CIC after it became clear the old ways of getting the Jewish community's message across to the wider public were no longer effective.

"What we have been doing wrong is not adapting our message to our target audience," said Marra Messinger, CIC's director of community development. "As Jews, I think we assumed that 'we only have to tell the truth' and people will come onside.

"We did not really understand how to think outside of the box. We assumed because it was important to us, that all people – once they understood – would also think it was important."

Messinger said this approach was naive and routinely failed to reach the desired effect.

"The new approach makes us leave our little subjective microcosm, and deal with an objective reality."

She said the idea for a survey and subsequent workshops came when CIC chief executive officer Shimon Fogel decided the messages pro-Israel advocates were using were not working effectively. There was also an impression that everyday Canadians were sympathizing with the Palestinians rather than the Israelis, she adds.

The CIC commissioned an Ottawa public relations consulting firm to conduct a poll designed to find out what matters to everyday Canadians. Using the results, the CIC concluded the message needs to shift from the previous, almost automatic assumption that the Jewish perspective is the correct one, to one that identifies values common to all Canadians.

Messinger said among a wide range of findings, the survey suggested average Canadians do not generally perceive Israel as a modern democratic state. They still think about it in terrorist-related or biblical terms. This makes it difficult for them to recognize similarities between Israel and Canada.

The survey also indicated Canadians generally don't want to get involved in the Mideast debate or pick a side, Messinger said. They don't relate to the conflict the way we might expect. The polls results suggested emotion is an ineffective way to build a pro-Israel message, she said, explaining that the message should instead be based on a logical presentation of facts that resonate with the target audience.

With those findings in mind, a group of CIC staff drafted material for a new Israel advocacy workshop.

In addition to the London session, the CIC has held workshops in Kingston, Montreal, Hamilton, Victoria, Vancouver, Edmonton, Calgary, Saskatoon, Fredericton, Moncton, St. John's and Toronto. The tour stops in Winnipeg on May 16 and wraps up in Ottawa at the beginning of June.

Messinger said they decided to go across the country because "the best results are achieved when the community speaks with a unified voice." Although the CIC interacts with community groups online, nothing replaces in person communication, she said.

She said we'll know the strategy is working when we begin to witness small changes in people's attitudes.

"This change can be as miniscule as a neighbour saying, 'Oh, I never thought of it that way,' all the way to a change in media coverage and government policy."

Menawhile, London Jewish Federation executive director Esther Marcus said the workshop has already spurred attendees to change the way they formulate messages to other Jews and to the broader secular community.

"There's no question it has already had a huge impact," she said.

The messages from these workshops are also being incorporated into upcoming community events such as the Yom Yerushalayim Walk for Israel, Marcus said. And an idea to twin a youth group in London with one in Israel grew directly out of the workshop. Marcus said initial community reaction has been positive and other groups have already approached her about holding similar workshops in the coming months.

Halachah should be basis for women's roles, Conservative scholar says

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The Conservative movement is still struggling with the issue of halachah and the role of women, but the rabbi of each congregation has the final say in any halachic ruling, says Rabbi Joel Roth, scholar-in-residence at a recent weekend hosted by Congregation Agudath Israel here.

Rabbi Roth, a leading authority on halachah in the Conservative movement and one of the main forces behind the movement's decision to ordain women rabbis some 20 years ago, has been a member of the Jewish law and standards committee of the Rabbinical Assembly, the body responsible for halachic decisions in the Conservative movement, for 25 years. He has been on faculty at the Jewish Theological Seminary since 1968.

His Sunday breakfast lecture attracted 75 people from all streams of Judaism to hear what he had to say about halachah and the role of women in Conservative Judaism.

"I refuse to accept the domino theory on women's issues," Rabbi Roth said. He disputed the claim made by some that if women are allowed to do one thing, it will inevitably lead to women being allowed to do everything else.

He explained that there are two categories of mitzvot: positive and negative. Women are not exempt from any of the negative mitzvot and are, in addition, obligated for all positive, non-time-bound mitzvot (such as honouring one's parents or affixing a mezuzah.) The only difference between men's and women's obligations is that women are exempt from positive, time-bound mitzvot, such as reciting the Shema at a certain time in the morning.

"Exempt is not the same as prohibited," said Rabbi Roth. "Women are eligible and entitled to observe the mitzvot from which they are exempt." For example, there is no halachic reason why a woman may not wear a tallit, which Rabbi Roth compared to a woman using a lulav and etrog.

"A woman who observes a mitzvah from which she is exempt is doing so voluntarily. A man observing the same mitzvah is doing so because the law commands it," he said.

He explored the questions of whether women should be allowed to be called to the Torah and to read the Torah and whether women should be counted for a minyan and be allowed to serve as chazzan.

"A minyan is a quorum of the equally obligated, and a chazzan is an obligated agent of the obligated community," said Rabbi Roth. The question lies in who is "obligated," and whether women can be so considered.

For each of the questions, Rabbi Roth outlined several rabbinic opinions and the basis for each, explaining that whether one agrees or disagrees with an opinion, the main criterion is that it must be backed up by Jewish law.

"In my opinion, there has got to be halachic defence for anything that we do. I have tried to make clear what there is no argument about and what there is argument about, and what is the grounding of the various views," he said.

The back of a headstone at the Memorial Garden Back River cemetery bears evidence of an anti-Semitic attack.

Gravestones vandalized in Montreal cemetery

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – The desecration of graves at the Back River Memorial Gardens Cemetery less than a month after the firebombing at United Talmud Torahs left Montreal Jews already traumatized by that attack feeling more shaken and vulnerable.

Jewish community officials said there did not seem to be any connection between the two incidents.

But with the UTT firebombing still very much on people's minds and a spate of cemetery desecrations last month in Ontario, it pointed to a disquieting pattern, they said.

"It's becoming clear that this incident can't be dismissed as isolated," said Rabbi Reuben Poupko, who co-chairs the community's Jewish Security Co-ordinating Committee. "It's part of an ongoing pattern of attack, a new era of anti-Semitism."

"I see it as a pattern, and it is the fact that it is a pattern that concerns me," said Rabbi Asher Jacobson of Congregation Chevra Kadisha B'nai Jacob. "It is increasing more and more and is not isolated, and the Jewish community should see it as a continuing pattern of hate."

Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region (CJC-Q) president Joseph Gabay called the incident an attack against all Quebecers.

"[Parti Québécois leader] Bernard Landry called me to say the same thing, and it is a good attitude to have," Gabay said.

Eight headstones at the cemetery, Montreal's oldest Jewish burial ground, informally called "Back River" because of its location in the Ahunsic area in the city's north end, had with anti-Semitic graffiti and slogans scrawled on them.

Several of the stones were those of member-families of the chevrah kadishah.

Some bore the usual Nazi swastikas, SS signs or declarations of "Heil Hitler," while others were more personal.

One headstone, which read, "Mother, always in our hearts," was changed to "Mother, always in hell."

Rabbi Jacobson said he received several calls from members wondering whether a family headstone was damaged.

"They were devastated, very hurt," he said.

One of the damaged headstones belonged to family that had fled Nazi Germany.

"To have this happen 50 years later, a Nazi swastika on their grave, is beyond comprehension," Rabbi Jacobson said.

At writing, the Montreal police hate-crime unit was investigating the incident, which was discovered by a cemetery worker over the weekend of May 1-2. Within a day, the headstones were sandblasted clean at the instruction of Baron de Hirsch Affiliated Cemeteries, which manages Back River. Its director, Gerald Silverberg, said a night watchman might be hired to watch over the cemetery grounds.

According to Yoni Petel, community outreach co-ordinator for B'nai Brith Canada, Quebec region, the incident might have taken place on April 30, the anniversary of Adolf Hitler's death.

"This is a significant date for the White Power movement," he said. "It may have been a 'celebration' of the date."

According to Petel and CJC-Q executive director David Birnbaum, there's been no incident at Back River for years, notwithstanding an April 9 scare – only four days after the UTT attack – when an unidentified package was detonated, only to be found harmless.

Petel said while last week's incident did not reach the same scale as the UTT attack, it was still a troubling indication of a new wave of anti-Semitism.

"Even a Jew who passed away is not given a chance to rest in peace," he said. "To desecrate a final resting place is absolutely disgusting."

Rabbi Jacobson said cemeteries have historically "been a vulnerable spot for attacking Jews. But to see one incident after another like this is alarming."

For Birnbaum, the incident serves as a reminder for the public and prosecutors that hate crimes must be treated differently than ordinary crimes and of the need for a "centralized registry" of hate crimes.

Human rights museum announces design finalists

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG – Two Canadian architects and one American firm have made it to the final three in the international competition to design the Canadian Museum for Human Rights, the last major project launched by philanthropist Izzy Asper before his death last September.

The finalists were announced at a press conference here late last month in which each finalist took time to illustrate their vision for the museum to the 200 people in attendance.

Saucier + Perrotte Architectes of Montreal described a design that evokes images of ice and snow and would also take up the least amount of space on the designated museum site at Winnipeg's historic Forks, overlooking the junction of the Red and Assiniboine rivers.

Dan Hanganun Architects & the Arcop Group, also of Montreal, presented a modern triangular design. Antoine Predock (based in Albuquerque, N.M.) showed a design that is carved into the ground and symbolizes ice, clouds and stone in a field of sweet grass.

The three finalists will each receive $100,000 to produce more detailed drawings, including a model. The winner will be announced July 1.

Asper launched his campaign to build the museum on April 17, 2003, the 22nd anniversary of the Canadian Declaration of Rights and Freedom.

He envisaged the $270-million complex as having a 70-metre Tower of Hope; a Canadian Gallery, which will explore dark periods in Canadian history; a Holocaust Gallery; a Hall of Fame and Shame, highlighting such moral icons as Mother Theresa and Nelson Mandela, as well as others who have become synonymous with evil; the Canadian Commitment Gallery, highlighting Canadian contributions to human rights; the Garden of Contemplation; a "barometer of hate," which will "measure" hate levels around the world on a daily basis; an exhibit on human rights in crisis; wireless palm pilots for students to record their impressions of the exhibits; and a "virtual museum" to connect the museum to the rest of the world via the Internet.

The Asper Family, through the Asper Foundation, has pledged up to $50 million toward the project. The federal, provincial and municipal governments have promised to contribute $140 million. The remaining money is being raised in the private sector through the Friends of the Canadian Museum of Human Rights, whose goal is to raise $60 million for an endowment fund. Thus far, $34 million has been contributed to the project by industry leaders, financial institutions and individuals.

At the press conference, Gail Asper, a driving force behind the fundraising campaign, said her late father's vision is obviously resonating with people.

"We met with representatives of 40 different ethnic, religious and racial groups just the day before," she said. "They were all very supportive of the museum. They felt empowered. It is a place for all Canadians and people worldwide."

Asper noted that close to 500 architectural firms from around the world initially responded to the call for submissions to design the museum. She also said New York-based Ralph Applebaum, the world's leading interpretive museum designer, has been hired to develop content for the museum. The complex is expected to open by July 2007.

Community expresses support for Israel

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — During the period of Yom Hazikaron and Yom Ha'atzmaut, the community here came out in force to a series of events, while a record 131-person delegation, including many of the local clergy, was in Israel on a solidarity mission.

The Embassy of Israel held a community-wide Yom Hazikaron ceremony at Congregation Agudath Israel to remember those who gave their lives for Israel. Colonel Yochanan Klorin, the army attaché to Canada of the Israeli Embassy, read the IDF Order of the Day.

Jonathan Freedman, a lieutenant-colonel in Israel's reserve forces, recalled his friends, neighbours and comrades who were lost. "These personal memories lead to a communal memory of the sacrifices these soldiers of Israel have made," he said.

A memorial torch was lit by Noga Reiss, whose brother, Yoram Shiloni, died in battle in 1972.

"This week is the most painful week in our calendar, Yom Hashoah and Yom Hazikaron," said Israel Ambassador Haim Divon. "Yom Hashoah is the essence of the State of Israel. The memory of the six million who perished strengthens our souls… and the more than 20,000 men and women [who have died in Israel's wars] help strengthen the body of the State of Israel. There are no words to comfort us, but the memory of each and every one of them is close to our hearts."

Students from Yitzhak Rabin High School, the Temple Israel Choir and musicians Floralove Katz and Natasha Guiller performed during the ceremony. Rabbi Arnold Fine of Congregation Agudath Israel and visiting Rabbi Maya Leibovich of Israel spoke, as did past-president of the Ottawa Vaad Ha'ir Gerry Levitz.

The mood was decidedly more festive the following evening when hundreds of people assembled at Congregation Agudath Israel for the community celebration of Yom Ha'Atzmaut, sponsored by the Vered Israel cultural and educational program of the Soloway Jewish Community Centre and the Embassy of Israel.

The evening of song and dance was chaired by Sara Vered, a veteran of Israel's War of Independence. The Hillel Academy Choir and the Shira Ottawa Choir presented a festive program of songs from Israel's past and present.

The following evening, the ambassador hosted a celebration for the diplomatic community and others at the Westin Hotel. A recital by concert pianist and former Youth Aliyah child Carmen Or was followed by traditional Israeli refreshments.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Canadian public was well-served by the media coverage that followed the May 2 Likud Party referendum, in which Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's Gaza disengagement plan was defeated. For the most part, the reporting and commentary on this important and complex event aimed for fairness and accuracy.

On CBC TV's The National, May 2, Adrienne Arsenault began her report with scenes of the bullet-ridden car in which a pregnant mother and her four young daughters were murdered by Palestinian gunmen near Gush Katif, Gaza, that same day.

With pictures of the family on the screen, Arsenault cited the Gaza settlers' claims that this was "proof that Sharon must not evacuate the Gaza settlements and give in to attackers."

Then, over scenes of the funeral, Arsenault presented the other side: "But in this grief, Sharon's supporters also saw proof that Israel should pull out, that the human cost of being in Gaza is just too great – a fight [that] on this day Sharon lost."

Arsenault said Sharon underestimated "the fury and the organization" of the settlers. She showed clearly the intense debate between the core settlers who oppose withdrawal and the "majority of Israelis" who support the pullout. Despite Sharon's setback, Arsenault continued, "it seems inevitable that he'll keep pushing for his plan."

On CTV's May 2 national newscast, reporter Inigo Gilmore also began with the murder of the mother and children, and the impact it might have had on the vote. He looked at how the "no" vote might affect Sharon's credibility and political future.

On May 3, CBC Radio's As It Happens featured an interview with Ra'anan Gissin, Sharon's chief spokesperson. Gissin predicted Sharon might initiate a "modified" withdrawal plan, or even resume negotiations with the Palestinians, providing the Palestinian Authority begins to fight terror, as required by the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan.

Illustrating how Sharon has become the voice of the moderate centre in Israeli politics, Gissin said those who voted against withdrawal were the "right-wing, extreme elements." He spoke about the "excruciating pain" of having to give up the Gaza settlements, but added: "You have to do your cost-benefit analysis, and to protect these 7,500 or 8,000 people surrounded by a sea of hatred of 1.3 million Palestinians" is no longer feasible.

Said Gissin: "Once we're not there, the Palestinians will have a real opportunity to start nation-building, to start doing something for themselves."

Most print editorials and op-eds also took a reasoned approach. The Globe and Mail's May 4 editorial, "Sharon should press on with his Gaza proposal," showed an understanding of the intricacies of Israeli politics. The editorial said Sharon "badly underestimated the political skills of the ultranationalist settlers, who portrayed disengagement as 'a reward for terrorism,' and the fanatical opposition of Likud's religious factions, which flatly reject any concessions to the Palestinians." But, as the title suggests, it urged Sharon to implement this "important initiative."

Globe and Mail columnist Shira Herzog ("Sharon's political headache," May 4) explained that "the majority of Israelis – including Likud voters – have long accepted the inevitability of partition," while the Likud party itself has been split. But now, among key party leaders, there's "a pragmatic, grudging acknowledgement of the imperative to disengage from the occupation of 3.5 million Palestinians."

Other well-informed pieces, providing different perspectives, included Samuel Segev's excellent analysis, "Defeat narrows Sharon's options" (Winnipeg Free Press, May 5), The Montreal Gazette's editorial "A surprise stumbling block" (May 5), and Cameron Brown's National Post opinion piece "The blow to Sharon is not a fatal one" (May 4).

Several years ago, the Globe and Mail decried a tendency in the media "mired in lazy habits [to] prefer the cut-and-dried to the complex, the cry of outrage to the cautious rumination." In handling the Likud referendum story, many in the media tried to understand and explain the challenging issues involved. Altogether, this was serious, responsible journalism.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. It seems that there is so much in the news today about a push to thinness and obesity and its dangers. Are things as bad as they seem?

A. Obesity is at epidemic proportions, for both children and adults, in Canada. I believe there are many factors that have led to this, and being overweight does pose many health risks. I worry, though, that we're sending a message that we need to get thin at all cost, and I believe there are far too many people on dangerous diets that could potentially compromise their health more than, or as much as, being overweight does, especially when those diets cause you to gain all of the weight and more back after they're over. I think there should be a push to educate people about healthy eating.

Q. Everybody seems to be carbohydrate crazy. Should we really be counting carbs?

A. I believe that many people do eat too many carbohydrates, but more importantly, I believe that almost everyone simply eats the wrong type of carbohydrates. We eat too many simple sugar and white flour foods and not enough whole grains, fibre, fruits and vegetables, legumes and lean proteins. I agree that everyone is talking about carbs these days, but instead of eliminating them, they should be reducing and replacing them with complex carbohydrates such as whole grain breads and cereals and whole wheat pasta. These carbohydrates fill us up, promote regularity and prevent heart disease (and maybe even some cancers). Our bodies, and especially our brains, require carbohydrates to function. Some diets that restrict carbohydrates can be dangerous and will likely lead to weight gain.

Q. My three-year-old loves milk and I know it's healthy, but I wonder if he's drinking too much. How much is enough?

A. Sixteen ounces, or two cups, of milk per day will provide the necessary calcium required for children. Drinking much more than that fills kids up and causes them to eat less of other foods. Try to limit his intake to this quantity.

Q. I just took away my daughter's bottle. She is 21 months and hasn't had a drop of milk since. I am very concerned. What should I do?

A. This is very common. My children also stopped drinking milk for about a year after I took away their bottles. Kids often drink the milk because of the comfort they associate with the bottle. When asked to drink it from a sippy cup, it doesn't have the same comfort factor and they refuse it. Try to get calcium into your toddler in other ways, such as yogurt, cheese, toddler ice cream, frozen yogurt, pizza, milkshakes, calcium-enriched orange juice and chocolate milk. As long as they are eating some of these foods, you're OK.

Mofaz: Gaza settlements were historical mistake

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Gaza Strip settlements were a historical mistake and they will not be there in five years, with or without a peace agreement, Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said Sunday at the fourth annual convention of the bar association in Eilat.

Mofaz said the Gaza Strip was not the land of our forefathers, and Israel's government must introduce and lead a diplomatic initiative that will replace the disengagement plan rejected last week in a Likud party referendum. Otherwise, other plans that are detrimental to Israel may be proposed.

"We can't significantly change the way we fight terror, but we must continue following the diplomatic track," Mofaz said, adding that any plan, initiative or peace agreement must be based on the termination of the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians.

Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, in a private meeting with Prime Minister Ariel Sharon on Sunday, also urged the prime minister to come up with an alternative to his disengagement plan. But Sharon and Netanyahu failed to come to any agreement over what Israel's future diplomatic policy should be during their meeting.

Sharon promised the cabinet Sunday that he will bring an alternative to his plan to unilaterally disengage from the Palestinians before the government, in three weeks.

But Netanyahu told the prime minister that three weeks is not enough time to come up with a proper alternative, and he urged Sharon to honour the referendum.

"A diplomatic plan is not a pair of socks that one changes every day. I am convinced that real consultations without a predetermined outcome will result in an agreement among Likud ministers, and I am happy to take part in such talks," Netanyahu said during the cabinet meeting.

He said the Likud poll "is binding for all Likud members, including the prime minister."

Netanyahu also said most Likud members would be prepared to make concessions, but not in the midst of terror, when they do not know what the results of the concessions would be, Israel Radio reported.

Tensions have simmered between the two since Netanyahu – along with Education Minister Limor Livnat and Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom – chose not to campaign actively for the disengagement plan, even though Netanyahu had announced his support for the initiative following Sharon's visit to Washington.

Shaul Mofaz

The cabinet gathered for its weekly meeting Sunday to discuss, among other issues, the implications of the Likud party's defeat of Sharon's disengagement plan on May 2.

The cabinet discussion was at the initiative of Justice Minister Yosef Lapid, who said Sunday that if there was no change in the status quo with the Palestinians, his Shinui party would leave the coalition.

Tourism Minister Binyamin Elon and Transportation Minister Avigdor Lieberman, both from the right-wing National Union party, walked out of the meeting to protest the fact the plan was being discussed, despite the defeat in the referendum.

The two said they did not see any point in discussing the disengagement plan or Lapid's alternatives. A source close to the two said Sunday that Sharon told his ministers it would have been preferable to discuss the disengagement at a later point, but he had decided to comply with a request by the justice minister to raise the matter at the meeting.

Sharon refused, however, to hold a broad discussion on an alternative plan. He said he would be meeting in the next few days with all cabinet ministers to help formulate his new proposal, and that there was no point in talking about a plan that was incomplete.

Lapid said a new plan should include the renewal of peace talks with the Palestinians.

"We can't now say, 'That's it, they rejected the disengagement plan, we're done. Everything is as it was,' in opposition to the American position, in opposition to the European position, in opposition to the Arab world, in opposition to most of the Israeli public," Lapid told Israel Radio.

However, Elon believes Lapid would not carry through on his threat to leave the coalition, saying the Shinui leader knows that if his party were to do so, the Shas and United Torah Judaism parties would take its place.

Elon also made threats. "Removing legal settlements that were established in Judea and Samaria [the West Bank] constitutes a red line," Elon said about his National Union party's participation in the government.

"If a legal settlement is evacuated, we will immediately leave the government," he said, adding the evacuation of illegal settlements must be judged on a case-by-case basis.

Security sources, meanwhile, report that Israel Defence Forces officers have in recent days held discussions with settler leaders in the West Bank, in an attempt to win their consent for the removal of illegal settlement outposts in the territories. The sources predicted that two or three such outposts would be dismantled this week.

The security sources claimed this weekend that settler leaders have been co-operative in the contacts with IDF officers about the outpost removal.

Sharon also told the cabinet Sunday that he would not be visiting the United States on May 17 as planned, to give him time to work on his alternative plan.

"The prime minister has decided not to go to Washington. He will be having consultations here in Israel regarding the disengagement plan," the Prime Minister's Office said Sunday.

MIA Ron Arad reportedly alive and being held in Lebanon

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli airman Ron Arad, who has been missing since his plan went down over Lebanon in 1986, is alive and being held in Lebanon, according to militant Mustafa Dirani.

Dirani, who was released from Israeli captivity in late January in a prisoner swap between Israel and Hezbollah, told the Iranian news agency on Monday that Arad is being held in Lebanon. He said there were no grounds to reports Arad is being held in Iran, Israel Radio reported.

"I believe that Arad is alive, there is a very high possibility that he is still alive. It is not realistic to say that he was transferred to Iran. He is being held in Lebanon," Dirani was quoted as saying.

Dirani, the former head of the Amal militia, is thought to be the last person to have seen Arad. Israel believes Dirani "sold" Arad to the Iranian Revolutionary Guard.

Dirani was abducted by an elite Israel Defence Forces unit from his home in south Lebanon in 1994 and was held by Israel for 10 years as a bargaining chip for Arad's release, along with another senior militant, Sheikh Abdel Karim Obeid. Obeid was also released in the January prisoner swap.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz on Sunday denied Israel has received any new information on Arad. In an interview with Army Radio, Mofaz said recent media reports, including one that Israel has received a bone fragment claimed by Hezbollah to be from Arad, are totally groundless. The Prime Minister's Office also denied Israel is examining a fragment.

But these statements contradict earlier claims by military sources, who said the bone was handed over by Lebanese officials in recent days, and that Israel is carrying out DNA tests on it. The outcome of the tests was said to be expected in the coming weeks.

Some six months ago, Israel received a bone fragment that Hezbollah said came from Arad's body. DNA tests, however, did not substantiate the claim, and Israel is said to be treating the new bone fragment with skepticism.

Sources say Hezbollah leaking information to the Lebanese media

Army Radio reported that Israel received the bone fragment via the German negotiators who brokered the January prisoner swap, in which Israeli captive Elchanan Tennenbaum and the bodies of three Israeli soldiers were returned in exchange for the release of more than 400 Palestinians and the bodies of some 60 Lebanese fighters.

Israeli security and political sources last week strongly denied reports of progress in contacts with Hezbollah on another prisoner deal, saying they knew nothing of any developments. They confirmed they had also heard rumours Hezbollah was planning to pass items to Israel that would help determine Arad's fate, but said they have not been passed on.

The sources said the reports and rumours originated in Lebanon, adding they believed elements close to Hezbollah were leaking information to the Lebanese media in order to apply psychological pressure and create the impression a deal was in the works and had almost been finalized.

The Lebanese daily Al-Mustaqbal reported that the second stage of the prisoner exchange deal between Israel and Hezbollah will include the return of the bodies of the three Israeli MIAs from the 1982 battle at Sultan Yakub, along with information on Arad.

Mofaz said last week it would be improper to release information about ongoing talks regarding Arad, "whether such exists or not."

Arad's brother, Chen, said in an interview with Army Radio last week that he was unaware of any new information about his brother. "Every time there is a political crisis in Israel, Ron is taken out of the mothballs," he said, alluding to problems facing Prime Minister Ariel Sharon after the Likud Party's rejected his Gaza disengagement plan.

Hezbollah attacks IDF

An IDF soldier, Staff Sgt. Dennis Laminov, 21, from Bat Yam, was killed, two soldiers were seriously wounded and three other soldiers were moderately wounded Friday morning, during a Hezbollah attack on IDF posts in the Mount Dov area along the Israeli Lebanese border.

Move chess tourney

Israeli chess officials demanded last week that this summer's world chess championships be moved, after host Libya said it would bar Israeli players. Libya's announcement ended expectations that the chess tournament could help improve relations between the longtime Middle East enemies.

U.S. freezes water projects

The United States is freezing its backing for two water projects in the Gaza Strip. The Palestinian Authority's failure to capture terrorists who killed three people in a U.S. diplomatic convoy in October is behind the action, the Associated Press reported last week. The projects will be placed on hold.

Israeli-Arab orchestra wins

An orchestra of Israeli and Arab music students was named best large ensemble at the Royal Philharmonic Society Awards in London. The East-West Divan Orchestra, founded by Jewish conductor Daniel Barenboim and the late Palestinian academic Edward Said, triumphed on Wednesday over better-known groups such as the Halle Ensemble. Israeli Ilan Volkov, 27, a conductor who heads the BBC Scottish Symphony Orchestra, was named young artist of the year.

Sharon survives vote

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon survived a no-confidence vote in the Knesset. The motion, submitted by Meretz and Arab parties, was rejected in a 62-46 vote. The motion came a day after members of Sharon's Likud party rejected his plan to withdraw from the Gaza Strip.

Rice defends withdrawal plan

Condoleezza Rice said the United States still supports Israel's plan to withdraw from the Gaza Strip. "It is still our view that a courageous step toward peace ought to be supported by the international community and the United States," President George W. Bush's national security adviser told the Anti-Defamation League in Washington. She said the Bush administration views the withdrawal plan as an opportunity to move forward on the Israeli-Palestinian track.

Court bars friendship

An Egyptian court rejected the establishment of an Egyptian-Israeli friendship association. The judge said Arabs do not need "false friendship," Associated Press reported. He went on to say relations with Israel should be left to Egypt's government.

Founder of bone marrow registry honored

By E. B. SOLOMONT
Jewish Telegraphci Agency

NEW YORK — Jay Feinberg doesn't like being called a hero. Founder of the Gift of Life bone-marrow registry, Feinberg reserves that term for organ donors.

Most people would disagree with him.

Last week, Feinberg, 35, received the inaugural Charles Bronfman Prize, a new award for humanitarian efforts in the Jewish world.

"Different people do wonderful things in the Jewish world and beyond," Stephen Bronfman said. Feinberg's story "really hit a note in all of us," he said. "How could it not? He's a real lifesaver."

Stephen Bronfman, along with Ellen Bronfman Hauptman and Andrew Hauptman, chose Feinberg for the prize, which was created in honour of their father's 70th birthday. The prize will be given annually.

"We wanted to do something that would respect what he has done through his life," Stephen Bronfman said. "To perpetuate Dad and his attention to humanitarian issues, to the Jewish world and to youth."

As part of the award, Feinberg will receive $100,000, most of which he plans to donate to Gift of Life, which is funded by private donations and grants, mostly from Jewish organizations.

Gift of Life is a bone-marrow registry geared specifically for Jews. The genetic make-up of all body tissue – including bone marrow – is an inherited characteristic, and Gift of Life offers Jews from similar ethnic backgrounds better odds of finding a viable donor.

Like other small ethnic groups, Jews are under-represented in the nearly 50 worldwide bone marrow registries. They face an added challenge because so many Jewish bloodlines were severed in the Holocaust.

Gift of Life grew out of Feinberg's own search to find a donor after he was diagnosed with leukemia in 1991. During the four years until he found a donor, nearly 60,000 people were tested – and some matched with other needy patients – thanks to an organization of family, friends and volunteers then known as Friends of Jay Feinberg.

Following his recovery, Feinberg created Gift of Life to expand the registry as a "way of giving back," he said.

"A hero saved my life," Feinberg said. "I can think of no greater thing to do with mine."

During the past decade, the organization has registered another 75,000 people as potential donors. Nearly 1,000 donations of bone marrow and peripheral blood cells already have taken place.

Feinberg said he hoped to announce a new cord-blood registry – blood from the umbilical cord, rich with immature stem cells, also is effective in bone marrow transplants. Cord blood often is a more viable donation than bone marrow or blood stem cells, but it can cost around $1,000 for the first year and $100 each year after that to store.

Feinberg's organization is expected to partner with Hillel this fall to mobilize college students for the cause.

To determine if two people match, doctors look at the proteins on the surface of each person's white blood cells. A "perfect match" occurs when 10 human antigens match up. The closer the match, the less chance there is of graft-versus-host disease, an ailment similar to organ rejection following an organ donation.

Feinberg's match was Becky Faibisoff of Milwaukee.

In order to accept Faibisoff's bone marrow, Feinberg's immune system was completely destroyed through total body irradiation and chemotherapy.

Then, over two hours, the new marrow was infused, followed by a grueling recovery that lasted nearly two years.

Since the 1995 procedure, science has progressed, as have Feinberg's efforts to keep his registry up to date.

Today, he said, doctors choose whether they want their patients to receive blood stem cells or marrow. Cord blood increasingly is harvested and stored for future transplants.

Already, Feinberg has attracted the attention of families whose relatives he has helped.

"There are nearly 1,000 people alive and well today because of his efforts," Warren Spector wrote in a letter endorsing Feinberg's nomination for the Bronfman Prize. "By his existence as a transplant survivor, Jay is a comforting presence. His own survival offers patients hope in their darkest hours."

UN: Palestinians have 'right to sovereignty'

By SHLOMO SHAMIR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — The United Nations General Assembly last week voted 140-6 to approve a resolution that says the Palestinians "have the right to self-determination and to sovereignty over their territory."

The vote was supposed to take place earlier in the day, but it was postponed to allow changes demanded by European countries to an earlier draft proposed by the PLO.

Israel, the United States and four Pacific islands were among the nations that voted against the resolution, while the 11 abstentions included Australia, Peru, Nicaragua, Costa Rica and the Dominican Republic.

According to the draft, "the status of the Palestinian territory occupied since 1967, including East Jerusalem, reminds one of military occupation, and affirms, in accordance with the rules and principles of international law and relevant resolutiuons of the United Nations, including Security Council resolutions, that the Palestinian people have the right to self-determination and to sovereignty over their territory, and that Israel, the occupying power, has only the duties and obligations of an occupying power under the Fourth Geneva Convention."

Earlier that day Israel told the UN that passing a draft resolution affirming Palestinian sovereignty over land outside the Green Line would undermine this week's statement by the Quartet for Mideast peace that borders must be determined bilaterally.

Toronto rabbi leads ecumenical tour to Israel

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — A peaceful glow emanated from the dining hall of Jerusalem's Dan Panorama Hotel last Thursday night, when a 22-member mission of Jews and Christians from across Canada dined together after their first day of a week-long solidarity tour of Israel.

The tour was led by Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Toronto's Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue, and former minister Dean Bye, executive director of Return Ministries in Centralia, Ont.

Rabbi Kelman initiated the joint project after meeting Bye a few months ago. The rabbi had been invited to Bye's conference centre to speak to Christians about Judaism.

Rabbi Kelman has never been on an interfaith mission before.

"It is working out very well so far," he says. "Here we have found a group of Christians who love Israel – Christian Zionists!"

For participant Rochelle Zubcov, a congregant at Beth Emeth, coming to Israel in a mixed group was a bit of a culture shock.

"The Christians on the mission talk about loving Jewish people and returning them to the land in a totally different vocabulary," says Zubcov, who brought along her 14-year-old daughter Shirley, a student at the Toronto Waldorf School.

"Jewish culture is more quiet and closed," she says. "They are very open, are dedicated to bringing blessings upon the Jewish people, the land and upon God. Their approach is neither better nor worse, just very different."

"The first time I came on a joint mission," Bye says, "there was an initial sense of discomfort between the Jews and the Christians and rightly so." He first came to Israel on a mixed mission with B'nai Brith Canada in June 2002.

"Historically, Christianity can be extremely threatening to a Jewish person. But we are doing what we can to help remove that threat so that we can begin to open up the lines of communication."

Bye has dedicated the last 12 years of his life to Israel advocacy. He has travelled several times across Canada visiting churches, with the aim of educating Christians about their relationship to Israel and the Jewish people.

"We want Christians to understand their roots, which are very Jewish, and then to find out what time it is prophetically speaking, to identify that we are living in the most exciting time in history, in the hour when the Jewish people are actually returning home," says Bye.

"As a Christian, the most important thing is to be found doing what I should be doing in the hour that I see right now, and that is to encourage the Church to get involved the way the Lord has written through His prophets, and that is to encourage the Jewish people who are ready to return to Israel to realize that they are doing the right thing, and to assist where we can assist."

Over the years, the same philosophy has driven Bye to raise enough money in Canadian churches to help more than 10,000 Jews across the former Soviet Union make aliyah.

"Isaiah 49:22, says, 'The Lord beckons to the gentiles to help bring its sons and daughters home,'" says Bye, "So, that's what we have been doing."

The question of Bye's intentions is a valid one, Rabbi Kelman says. "Do the Christians hope that one day, 1,000 years from now, we will all become Christian?" he asks. "Maybe, but I don't even want to think about that. What's important is that they are going back to their communities and speaking highly about Israel and the Jewish people."

Bye denies that his intentions include conversion. "It's not about what will happen in the future," he explains. "My motivation to do what I do is that His name is hallowed through His people when they come back to the land and restore the land and that tells the nations that He is in fact God.

"If God's name can be exalted and revealed because the Jewish people are doing what He's called them to do and the nations begin to see this, then they come to know the one true God."

For Bye, coming to Israel on a mission with Jews is the greatest pleasure in the world. "It is phenomenal to come to Israel as a Christian," he says, "However, to come to Israel with Jewish people is a whole new experience.

"The more the Jewish people would avail themselves [of the chance] to help us Christians understand how they feel about what's happening in Israel, the more it enlightens us," he says. "And for the Jewish people to beckon to the fullness of their call, they must be a light to the goyim."

Rabbi Joseph and Sara Kelman at a pre-trip meeting with Christian tourists to Israel.

Bye's passion is contagious. "It's very rewarding to travel with the Christians. They are marvelous and sincere people," says Rabbi Kelman's wife, Sara. "It feels very good to be supported by them. God knows we have enough enemies, so it's wonderful to have friends, and these are true friends."

Sara Kelman was one of only four Jews who decided to join the mission, a fact that disappointed Rabbi Kelman, considering that the Beth Emeth congregation has more than 1,450 families.

"The trip was supposed to be joint between members of Beth Emeth and Christians, but I am sorry to say that very few Jews decided to come."

Rabbi Kelman says 20 community members agreed to join, but changed their minds. "Without being critical, I am embarrassed that the Jewish community didn't respond as well as the Christian one."

But the Kelmans believe the project is still a success. "The objective of the trip was to bring Jews and Christians together to learn from each other," Rabbi Kelman says. "I wanted to give the Christians a proper perspective of being Jewish in Israel and to encourage all participants to return to their respective communities and encourage more people to come to Israel."

"The interchanges between Rabbi Kelman and Dean Bye have been very interesting," Zubcov says. "We are getting a lot of different perspectives."

"Rabbi Kelman can expound the richness of the scriptures because he has all the history, culture and tradition," says participant Cathy Prout, a pastor in Centralia. "He has opened up the scriptures in a whole new way that has really deepened my understanding."

"I didn't know that the Jewish people had a call deep within them, that God was calling them back," says Prout with a tear in her eye. "But, when I realized this, the scriptures started coming alive and so did my love for the Jewish people and the land of Israel."

Germany to fund survivors 'social needs'

NEW YORK — In what is described as an important breakthrough, the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference), following negotiations last week with the German ministry of finance in Berlin, announced the German government has made a first commitment for funds towards a program to meet the "social needs" of Nazi victims.

An initial sum of $7.2 million (US) will be allocated in 2004, and the Claims Conference plans to use these funds to provide homecare for needy Jewish victims of the Nazis.

Discussions of ongoing needs will take place at the end of the year, the Claims Conference said in a statement.

"This is a significant first step in dealing with a complex and important issue," said Israel Singer, Claims Conference president.

As well, an agreement was also reached with the German government to include survivors who lived illegally under a false identity or with false papers during World War II. This group will now be eligible for compensation under the Claims Conference's Article 2 Fund and Central and Eastern European Fund pension programs.

Formerly, under German government criteria, only survivors who were under 18 and lived under false identity apart from their families were eligible for these funds.

As a result of this new agreement, survivors who lived illegally under false identity or with false papers will now receive pensions irrespective of their age at the time of the war or whether they were separated from their families.

"People who survived the war with false identity papers are being recognized," said Gideon Taylor, Claims Conference executive vice-president.

For more information, go to www.claimscon.org.

Also last week, the Austrian National Fund announced another extension of application deadlines for compensation for war-era loss of apartments and small business leases, household property, personal valuables and effects until June 30, 2004.

Those who have received payments under the National Fund have been contacted to apply to be compensated for the above-mentioned losses. Lump-sum payments will be $7,000 per person.

For information, contact the Austrian Embassy at 613-789-1444 or at ottawa-ob@bmaa.gv.at.

And in related news, the Claims Conference said last week it has allocated nearly $400,000 to help gentiles who sheltered Jews during World War II. The recently allocated money brings to almost $5 million the amount given to Righteous Gentiles by the Claims Conference since 1963. More than 1,630 individuals receive the assistance.

Support group for women with cancer draws over 400

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

More than 400 people, mostly women, attended the first awareness evening presented by the L'Chaim Cancer Support Group for Jewish Women at the Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue.

Four panellists spoke on the theme of "What Every Jewish Woman Should Know About Cancer:" Dr. Ellen Warner, lead researcher of a genetic study of Jewish women with breast cancer; cancer specialist Dr. Steven Gallinger; Elizabeth Erlich, co-founder of L'Chaim; and Rosie Sherman, an inspirational speaker and member of L'Chaim.

Panel moderator Marci Tenenbaum is a co-founder of L'Chaim, which was formed in 1999 by cancer survivors committed to helping others cope with cancer.

Warner, a medical oncologist at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre and a consultant to L'Chaim, spoke on "Are Jewish Women at Greater Risk for Breast and Ovarian Cancer?"

She said there is a five times greater frequency among Jewish women of inherited genetic abnormalities that predispose them to breast and ovarian cancer. About two per cent of Ashkenazi women and men carry one of these genetic abnormalities inherited from either their mother or father.

Genetic testing, she said, is available to Jewish men and women whose family history of cancer suggests that the cancer may have been caused by such a gene. Women found to carry this abnormal gene have several good options for cancer prevention and/or early detection.

She asked the audience if they thought more women or fewer women are getting breast cancer. Most replied it had increased.

"Surprisingly," she said, "the correct answer is that it is the same number in North America."

She explained that it seems as if there is more breast cancer because as we get older, our friends, relatives and co-workers also get older, and we hear about more cases of breast cancer. As well, the press projects a breast cancer epidemic.

She spoke of risk factors. Along with family history of breast cancer, there is a risk for women who start to menstruate before age 12 or who menstruate into their mid 50s. There are other factors over which women can have some control, such as being overweight, using hormone replacement therapy and having no children or having your first child after the age of 30.

She noted that studies suggest regular exercise is the best way to lower breast cancer risk. Although scientists are unable to agree on what an optimal diet should be, she said that "the only thing we know for sure about diet is that drinking alcohol is a risk factor for breast cancer, although [having] up to three or four drinks a week is quite safe."

She emphasized the need for early screening by mammography, "in the hope that if cancer occurs, it will be found at a stage when it is still curable – but that's not the whole answer."

She said women need to know the early symptoms of breast cancer – a new breast lump or thickening, bloody nipple discharge, dimpling of the skin or a change of size, shape or colour of the breast.

She stressed that all women should have screening mammograms beginning at age 50.

On the other hand, "screening for ovarian cancer, has not been found to be useful so far," she said.

She explained that symptoms of ovarian cancer often don't appear until the cancer is quite advanced. "There are some symptoms that occur many months before diagnosis, which women tend to ignore. The commonest of these are pain, bloating and bladder symptoms."

Gallinger, senior investigator in the program in molecular biology and cancer at the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute at Mount Sinai Hospital and professor in the department of surgery at the University of Toronto is doing research on both inherited and acquired molecular aspects of gastrointestinal cancer.

Findings suggest that at least one-third of pancreatic cancer patients have a fairly strong family history of cancer, and efforts to discover pancreatic cancer predisposition genes are underway, he said.

Colorectal cancer is equally common in men and women. "The disease is 100 per cent preventable. We don't talk about this issue enough," Gallinger said.

There are 20,000 new cases of colorectal cancer a year in Canada, and the same number of new cases of breast cancer.

There is a 75 to 80 per cent survival rate for breast cancer patients, he said, whereas colorectal cancer has a lower cure rate of 50 to 60 per cent. He emphasized the need to recognize some symptoms which include change of bowel habits (diarrhea or constipation), blood in the stool, loss of weight and fatigue.

Anti-inflammatories and low doses of aspirin can reduce the chance of developing polyps, some of which may lead to cancer.

He stressed the importance of knowing the risk factors, such as family history. "Most people do not have a high risk," he said. He said screening should begin at age 50 for everyone.

Speaking on "How to Reach Out and Help a Friend Undergoing Cancer Treatment," Sherman spoke about her diagnosis, "which shocked me" and thanked L'Chaim members for their support. Some suggestions for helping others were: offer to drive young children, cook and bring dinner, offer to do the shopping or to drive the patient to the hospital for treatment.

"Take time to make a mitzvah. Spend quality time together," she said.

Erlich told of her personal journey with cancer and the founding of L'Chaim. She said there are many resources available, particularly within the Jewish community. Along with emotional support, L'Chaim provides cancer patients with this information.

"No Jewish woman here in Toronto who hears the words that I heard, a diagnosis of cancer, has to face the diagnosis alone," Erlich said. "L'Chaim is here for you."

Brain tumour fundraiser has South Beach theme

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

South Beach comes to Toronto this month for the annual Gerry and Nancy Pencer Brain Trust fundraiser.

The event will be held May 27 at the Liberty Grand entertainment complex at Exhibition Place at 7:30 p.m. Proceeds will go to research and patient care at the Pencer Brain Tumor Centre at Toronto's Princess Margaret Hospital.

Fashion maven Jeanne Beker will host the evening.

Entertainment will include latin music and dancing to Samba Squad and Cache, Cuban-style tapas, South Beach-inspired cocktails, a silent auction, and a raffle $25,000 cash (compliments of the Gerry and Nancy Pencer Brain Trust), a luxury South Beach vacation, or a Toronto Argonauts skybox for 12.

Plans are for celebrity designer Nicholas Pinney to create an art deco-style bar and lounge, featuring dancers, models and what a media release describes as "beautiful people in sexy club wear."

Last year's event raised more than $500,000 from its 850-plus guest list, and organizers hope to better that amount this year.

The Pencer Centre described itself in a press release as "Canada's most comprehensive brain tumour facility, revolutionizing the way patients are diagnosed, treated, educated and supported throughout their illness. This unique approach to patient care has made Princess Margaret Hospital a leading facility for clinical brain tumour research in North America."

Gerry Pencer was diagnosed with a grade 4 glioblastoma multiform brain tumor in 1997. Realizing there was a lack of readily available resources for brain tumour patients, he founded the Gerry and Nancy Pencer Brain Trust, a not-for-profit organization with a mandate to make a difference in the quality of life for people living with brain tumours. Pencer died in 1998.

For more information, or to order tickets, call the South Beach hotline, 416-923-2999, or visit the website, www.pencerbraintrust.com.

German filmmaker highlights wartime exploits of the Ritchie Boys

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

They interrogated German prisoners of war, defectors and civilians. They amassed tactical and strategic data of great value. They drafted propaganda leaflets and produced radio broadcasts.

They were graduates of Camp Ritchie, a remote U.S. army facility in Maryland's Blue Ridge Mountains where they had been trained in intelligence work and psychological warfare.

Christian Bauer

Their little-known story is told in The Ritchie Boys, an intriguing new movie, screened at last month's Hot Docs documentary film festival in Toronto.

Christian Bauer, the German director, heaped praise on its graduates, many of whom were Jews of German and Austrian origin.

"They gathered information that influenced tactical and strategic decisions," said Bauer, a 56-year-old filmmaker who lives in Munich.

Their efforts, which have largely gone unsung, may well have shortened World War II and saved innumerable lives on both sides.

At first, ironically, they were considered security risks by the U.S. government. Eventually, their linguistic skills and intuitive understanding of the enemy's psychology were put to good use in the titanic struggle against Nazi Germany.

To a man, they were highly motivated, though their sloppy military bearing left something to be desired.

"We were committed to this war for personal and ideological reasons," one of the Ritchie Boys observes. "We were driven."

"I knew I had to fight fascism," another one comments. "It had to be defeated."

Germany was riding high in 1942 when Camp Ritchie began training the first batch of recruits who would be known as the Ritchie Boys.

They learned Morse code, the principles of aerial photography and the German army's order of battle. In addition, they were taught how to use a compass and the art of close combat.

The first group of German troops they grilled were POWs who had been rounded up in North Africa. Later, they interrogated German prisoners who fought in the pivotal 1944 Battle of the Bulge.

The Ritchie Boys

The Geneva Conventions did not require a soldier to reveal more than his name and serial number. But through a combination of gentle persuasion, charm, jokes and the threat of being handed over to the Russians, the Ritchie Boys coaxed important information out of their German captors.

Toward the close of the war, the Ritchie Boys collected key documents and arrested Nazi officials in Aachen – the first German city to fall to the Allies – and visited the liberated Buchenwald concentration camp in Germany.

Not all of them emerged unscathed, some having been captured and others having been shot.

After the war, many of the Ritchie Boys enjoyed successful careers in the professions as university professors, psychiatrists, lawyers and the like. One individual, Richard Schifter, was a United States ambassador to the United Nations.

Bauer, who interviewed 18 of them, chalks it up to coincidence that all of the Ritchie Boys in his film are Jewish. "I also interviewed non-Jews, but they didn't make it into the film."

Two of the Ritchie Boys, the seasoned documentarian disclosed, refused to talk to him because of his German background. "I understand that, though I would have liked to explain myself."

He confesses he had mixed feelings about undertaking The Ritchie Boys.

As a German, he found it odd to be working on a movie in which Germany is the villain of the piece.

But as a liberal who abhors Germany's Nazi past with every fibre of his being, he felt perfectly at ease. "Many of us – my generation – thought of the Western allies as liberators," he explained.

Bauer, who once produced a film about the American Holocaust rescuer Varian Fry, basically stumbled upon the exploits of the Ritchie Boys while reading the memoirs of a Czech Jew named Hans Burger and a 1940s novel by Stefan Heym titled The Crusaders.

"I had read a lot about Jews who had left Germany," said Bauer, whose late grandfather, Hans, was a professor of Semitic languages at the University of Halle and who, inexplicably, joined the Nazi party in the penultimate year of the war.

"I was very much interested in this history, and thought Germany had suffered a tremendous loss when Jews were forced to emigrate," said Bauer, whose mother attended a Jewish school.

> Their efforts, which have largely gone unsung, may well have shortened World War II and saved innumerable lives

He added: "Jewish and German cultures were so close and almost inseparable. To see that cut off was an act of self-mutilation. That Germany disconnected itself from this part of our culture was painful."

In his view, Jewish artists and intellectuals enriched German culture tremendously. "Whoever looks at this question with a clear vision has to agree with this," said Bauer, whose father was drafted into the Wehrmacht at the age of 17 and then captured as a POW. "Just look at the contributions of German Jewish emigrés in North America."

Initially, Bauer was unable to raise funds for The Ritchie Boys. As he was about to throw up his hands in despair and abandon the project, a colleague persuaded him to persevere.

"I'm very happy I could make this film," said Bauer, who is at a loss for words when he tries to explain why a cultured, civilized nation such as Germany could have embraced a genocidal agenda. "But it was worth the wait."

NEW BOOK CELEBRATES CAREER OF BOBBIE ROSENFELD, 'CANADA'S GREATEST ALL-ROUND ATHLETE'

Bobbie Rosenfeld, born in Russia in 1904, came to Canada as an infant and grew up to be regarded by many as Canada's greatest all-round athlete of the 20th century.

Rosenfeld excelled in an astonishing array of sports and won both gold and silver for Canada at the 1928 summer Olympics in Amsterdam. Later in life, she enhanced her legend as a sports writer for the Globe and Mail. She died in 1969.

Anne Dublin, a Toronto teacher-librarian and writer, has just completed a biography of Rosenfeld. Released in an attractive and inexpensive edition by Second Story Press, the book is called Bobbie Rosenfeld: The Olympian Who Could Do Everything. It is especially suited to young readers.

Dublin is speaking at a book launch at the Miles Nadal JCC, 750 Spadina Ave. at Bloor. Thursday, May 13, 7 p.m. 416-924-6211.

Also at the Miles Nadal JCC, two of Canada's acclaimed mystery writers, Sylvia Maultash Warsh and Caroline Roe, present a Mystery Morning as they read from their recent works. For Warsh, it's the novel Find Me Again; for Roe, another intricately plotted tale of Isaac of Girona. Books & Bagels. Members free, non-members $5. Includes coffee and bagels. Sunday, May 16, 11 a.m.

Names in the News: "Honest" Ed Mirvish and his wife Anne were given a stellar reception at last week's gala opening of Hairspray at the Princess of Wales Theatre. Having recovered from a long illness, Ed Mirvish re-entered public life after a year's absence with his geniality and sense of humour seemingly intact as he bantered with a row of TV reporters outside the theatre. Inside, the legendary couple received a standing ovation as they took their seats... Hairspray itself is an energetic, joyous, swirling confection of music, dance, nostalgia and high-spiritedness. With a lively score by Marc Shaiman and effervescent performances from a huge cast headlined by Vanessa Olivarez (as Tracy Turnblad), this feel-good musical, which originated in Seattle and is set in Baltimore, is likely to be playing in Toronto for a long time to come. 1962 never looked so good. 416-872-1212.

Yiddish Stage Legend on Film: The Toronto Jewish Film Society presents The Komediant, an Israeli-made feature documentary that brings back the glory days of the Yiddish stage by focusing on dancing-singing comedian Pesach'ke Burstein and his legendary theatrical family. Shirley Kumove, Yiddish author and cultural interpreter, is guest speaker.

Al Green Theatre, Miles Nadal JCC. $12 general admission, seating limited, 18+. Sunday, June 6, 4 and 7 p.m. 416 924-6211, ext. 111.

* * *

Names in the News II: Award-winning California journalist Sue Fishkoff spent a year visiting Chabad emissaries throughout North America, then wrote The Rebbe's Army: Inside the World of Chabad-Lubavitch, recently published by Schocken. She's giving a talk at the Vancouver JCC on June 10. At the same venue, Toronto poet Karen Shenfield reads from her collection The Law of Return on May 20, and Ottawa children's author Sharon Abron Drache reads from her book The Magic Pot (which is set in Toronto's Annex) on May 25... Oscar-winning director Steven Spielberg has been scouting European locations for a movie treatment of the 1972 Munich Olympics where 11 Israeli athletes were killed after an attack by Palestinian terrorists. Eric (Forrest Gump) Roth completed the screenplay for the as-yet-unnamed film, which is slated to go into production in June, possibly with Ben Kingsley in a leading role.

Thornhill teens aim high in theatre/ filmmaking scene

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Canada has spawned several talented theatre partners, from Jordan and Adam Pettle to Soulpepper founders Albert Schultz and Susan Coyne.

Thornhill teens Daniel Karasik and Glen Drutz are the latest duo in a theatre scene full of 20-something hopefuls and grizzled veterans.

Karasik is a 17-year-old playwright who has staged work at Toronto's Tarragon Theatre and the Buddies in Bad Times Theatre. Drutz, 18, has acted in eight of Karasik's plays.

"Theatre is not just for an older group of people," Drutz said in an interview at Starbucks at Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue.

Karasik nodded in agreement.

"I'm more mature having worked with these great people," he said. "I've seen how I can relate to a community outside a school setting."

Drutz, a York University student, is planning several filmmaking projects with two fellow York students, and in September, the group will begin shooting their first film.

While Karasik primarily wrote plays for his school, Westmount Collegiate, three years ago, the teen has since written pieces for the under-21 segment of the annual Rhubarb! Festival and for this year's Paprika Festival at the Tarragon Theatre.

Daniel Karasik

The latter play, In Europe the Ceilings Are Very High, uncovered raw emotions in complex personalities.

Considering its two main characters were Europe-trekking lesbians, was Karasik following the writing maxim "Write what you know?"

Karasik smiled and said, "I've never been to Europe and I've never been a lesbian. But the play is based on observation, on the universal truths that I've seen and heard."

In the play, Drutz acted in a minor role as a waiter-cum-boyfriend to one of the girls before she "turns" lesbian, and his performance showed a range from tender lover to sly womanizer. He said Karasik's vision of the role complemented his own take.

The two friends who met at Westmount share a sense of humour Karasik calls "particular," and they share a love of theatre and a perfectionist attitude.

"For an actor, nights go by without sleep and days go by without lunch," Drutz said. "But that's one of the sacrifices you have to make."

Karasik, who founded a company called Dressed Cod Theatre, said, "It really bothers me when I hear talk about the business side of theatre as if that's all there is to it. Sure, you need to know the business side to survive, but you also need to know the life of an artist."

He said theatre graduates often leave school as skilled actors, but without an opportunity to ply their trade.

"Yeah, it's difficult, and you learn by doing."

Karasik has also acted in several productions, including a role as Gregor Samsa in an adaptation of Franz Kafka's The Metamorphosis. Last year, he played a boy in the critically acclaimed Stories From The Rains Of Love And Death. He is well-read enough to have named one of his plays after a line from Puck's speech in Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream: Even before it premiered at Buddies in Bad Time Theatre in February, Night's Swift Dragons attracted media attention from the alternative weekly NOW magazine. (A year earlier, another paper, eye Weekly, interviewed him for a feature on the Under 21 Rhubarb! Festival.)

Karasik is currently working on a play about the recent spate of anti-Semitic acts in Toronto. He said he hopes to attend the University of Toronto, but added, "If something came along that would give me an education in the world beyond the classroom, I might opt for it [instead]."

Macias returns to Toronto after four years on May 20 at 8 p.m. at the Elgin Theatre, 189 Yonge St.

Macias, whose real name is Gaston Ghrenassia, was born in Constantine, Algeria in 1938 At 15, Gaston was already a member of the orchestra and the heir-apparent to the Arab-Andalusian music unique to Constantine called Maalouf.

He moved to France during the 1961 guerrilla war of independence.

After singing in café terraces, he made his first record, Adieu mon Pays, under his new name, Enrico Macias, about leaving his country, family and friends and his fame began to spread.

Enrico Macias

Macias was invited to perform in Egypt in 1978 by then-president Anwar Sadat. Macias, the son of a Jewish family from Algeria, who had been banned from Arab countries for many years, sang a message of peace to 20,000 people, at the foot of the pyramids.

He notes that he is determined to bring Jewish-Arab culture back to life through its music, because it was music that forged a bridge between Jews and Muslims in the past.

In 2003, Macias released Oranges Amères, an album produced by his son Jean-Claude Ghrenassia that features the singer's comeback to the eastern sounds of his early career.

Shimon Zer-Aviv, producer and host of the Israel Today show on CHRY community radio, is the producer of the Enrico Macias performance in Toronto. He says he is delighted that the international performer has included a Toronto performance along with performances in New York, Los Angeles, Washington and Miami.

"When Enrico performs in Arab-Muslim countries, he proudly announces his Jewish background," Zer-Aviv says.

In 1981 Macias was awarded the Singer of Peace award by the United Nations after he donated royalties to UNICEF.

Snoa synagogue in Curaçao is a major attraction

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

WILLEMSTAD, Curaçao — Although it's located barely 50 kilometres off the coast of Venezuela, Curaçao feels more European than other islands in the Caribbean.

The whimsical Dutch colonial buildings resemble Technicolor jewel boxes, and the local dialect, Papiamentu, is a lilting melange of Dutch, Spanish, Portuguese and English. Dutch alone is spoken widely among the tiny island's 135,000 multi-hued residents, who represent an exotic hodge-podge of European cultures and tongues.

Curaçao, one of five Caribbean islands that comprise the Netherlands Antilles (Aruba split off in 1986), still holds its Dutch roots in high regard. The country is proudly part of the Kingdom of the Netherlands, which conquered the islands from the Spanish in 1634.

About the only place that summons a Caribbean feel here is the synagogue in Curaçao's tidy little capital, Willemstad. A burly security guard stands at an outer canary-yellow wall just around the corner from the town's tony shopping area. Inside, the visitor finds a cool, quiet courtyard adorned with potted plants and a door that leads into the oldest synagogue in continuous use in the Western hemisphere.

Going through that door is like stepping through a portal to a lost time. Every visitor, it seems, draws a sharp little breath upon first sight of the sublime Congregation Mikvé Israel-Emanuel (referred to locally as "The Snoa"). The heavy copper chandeliers that hold candles, the dark, carved mahogany pews, bimah and aron kodesh, the azure-stained glass windows and, of course, the thick carpet of fine beige sand on the floor all convey a sense of serenity, but also resonate with a history that unites many Caribbean Jews.

The sole difference here is that everything has a Dutch flavour, spiced generously with Spanish, Portuguese and African influences. The 500 Jews in Curaçao refer to Amsterdam, the city of their forebears, as "the new Jerusalem."

Our guide today is René Maduro, the gruff but amiable self-described "18-time past president" of the synagogue, whose family came to the island in 1674.

Maduro relays the background: The first Jew to arrive in Curaçao was Samuel Cohen of Portugal, a translator with the conquering Dutch fleet.

Seventeen years later, in 1651, 12 Jewish families arrived from Amsterdam's Portuguese community to work plantations under the charter of the Dutch West Indies Co. That same year, they established the island's first synagogue, the Mikvé Israel, on Plantation De Hoop ("The Hope").

A second group of Jewish settlers came in 1659 and brought with them a gift: a Torah scroll, which is used by the congregation to this day.

The settlers, like those who came later, descended from Jews who had fled the Inquisition in Spain and Portugal and found refuge in Holland and northern Brazil. But their efforts to till the arid soil failed, and they moved into the walled town of Willemstad to become successful traders, merchants and bankers.

There, in 1674, the first of four small synagogues was established, probably in a private residence. The last was constructed in 1703, demolished in 1730 and rebuilt as the more spacious, current congregation, which was consecrated on erev Pesach in 1732 and is still going strong.

Mikvé Israel-Emanuel's soaring architecture, Maduro explains, was modeled on the Esnoge, the grand Portuguese Sephardi synagogue in Amsterdam. One of the Snoa's four massive chandeliers dates from the synagogue that was torn down in 1703. Together, the chandeliers hold 144 candles, which are kindled only on special occasions. One of them is Kol Nidre, when the men wear top hats and tails, and the rabbi is garbed completely in white.

"Imagine, if you're a romantic like me, what that's like," says Maduro. "It's a service that is incredible."

Another time all the candles were lit was in 2001, when the entire island, including visiting members of the Dutch royal family, celebrated the synagogue's 350th anniversary.

There was a brief bout of sectarianism when Reform-minded members broke off in 1864 to form Temple Emanuel. The split lasted for exactly a century, and in 1964, the two re-merged.

Though constructed with a balcony just for women, the synagogue went completely egalitarian in 2000, but not without a fight. And while still unmistakably Sephardi, its affiliation, oddly enough, is Reconstructionist. "We didn't want any of the traditional labels," Maduro explains.

About 100 dues-paying members live abroad. The congregation welcomes a steady stream of outside weddings and b'nai mitzvot, "but they are done according to our rules," Maduro states emphatically.

Indeed, the Sephardi nature of the congregation is obvious. The bimah, for example, is called the haychal, while the rabbi's pulpit, in the middle of the synagogue, is the taybah. There are still some prayers said in Spanish or Portuguese, including one for the welfare of the much-loved Dutch queen, Beatrix.

All but one of the 18 sifrei Torah are more than 300 years old, and all are written in Spanish-Portuguese Hebrew script. A master sofer is spending much of the spring on the island repairing the scrolls.

Meantime, the island's roughly 100 Ashkenazim – who are modern Orthodox – formed their own congregation, the Sharei Tsedek, in 1959, and are building their first freestanding synagogue on the edge of the capital.

Maduro concedes that, like most other Caribbean synagogues, the sand on the floor of Mikvé Israel-Emanuel is meant to remind worshippers that their post-Inquisition ancestors used the material to muffle the sounds of their secret prayers. But, he stresses, it also recalls the ancient Hebrews' desert wanderings as well as God's promise to Abraham to "multiply thy seed as the sand which is upon the seashore."

Maduro and other leaders are worried the Jewish numbers won't hold steady for very long. The age of the average member is the late 50s, and emigration to the United States and Holland is a concern. There are minyanim only on Shabbat and holidays, and kosher food is available only from South America.

On the other hand, there are 30 children in the community's Hebrew school, and there are active chapters of B'nai Brith and Hadassah. Israel's ambassador to Venezuela visits from time to time.

Common Jewish surnames include Henriquez, Caprile, Jesurun – and Maduro, who shakes his head emphatically when asked about anti-Semitism. "None at all," he pronounces, noting the community gets along well with the island's Muslims, estimated at between 1,000 and 2,000. Curaçao is 85 per cent Roman Catholic, with a smattering of Hindus and a small number of adherents of Syncretismo, a blend of voodoo and animist beliefs.

No visit to the synagogue is complete without a tour of the adjacent two-storey museum, which houses a stunning array of Jewish artifacts and ritual objects, including spice boxes, Torah covers, candlesticks and a Torah that dates to the 1300s.

In contrast with the synagogue's inviting warmth, the historic Beth Haim Jewish cemetery is a tad spooky. The oldest Jewish burial grounds in the Americas, opened in 1659, sits on a rocky, windswept plain outside Willemstad, the epitaphs on many of the 2,500 gravestones barely legible owing to the devastating combination of acid rain and sulfuric fumes from a massive oil refinery right next door.

The acrid smell, though, does little to detract from the fascination a visitor may feel upon discovering some of the symbols on the tombstones, including sailing ships and skull-and-crossbones.

Pearl may not have been sufficiently vigilant, author says

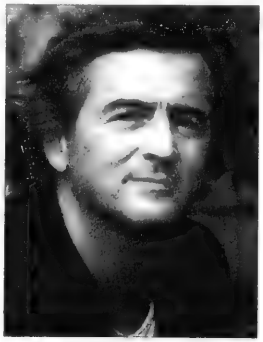
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Four years before his brutal murder in 2002, Daniel Pearl, ironically, compiled a handbook on security issues for the newspaper that employed him, The Wall Street Journal.

Pearl, a meticulous reporter, dealt with every conceivable issue except kidnapping, the crime that eventually led to his grisly death in Karachi, Pakistan.

The question that arises is whether Pearl, the victim of Islamic radicalism, might have been careless. Bernard-Henri Levy, the author of Who Killed Daniel Pearl? (Melville House), leaves the impression that Pearl was not sufficiently vigilant.

He may have underestimated the dangerous environment in which he found himself. "Pearl was a journalist… working in one of the countries of the world where it is least propitious to be a journalist, where all journalists are… in permanent mortal danger," Levy writes in this thoughtful, sometimes riveting book.



Bernard-Henri Levy

Did he realize that Western foreign correspondents and spies are invariably lumped together in Pakistan?

And was he aware of the "virulent anti-Semitism of the Pakistanis?"

Certainly, Pearl put himself in harm's way by virtue of the fact that he was a Jewish reporter in a Muslim nation seething with anti-Western resentment.

Before Pearl was killed, his head severed from his torso and his body cut into 10 pieces, his captors released a tape in which he was forced to say, "I am American. I am Jewish. My family on my mother's side is Zionist."

On the eve of his abduction by Omar Sheikh, who is now behind bars in Pakistan, Pearl was hot on the trail of Richard Reid's mentor, Mubarak Ali Shah Gilani. Reid, a British convert to Islam, was the infamous "shoe bomber," the terrorist who tried to blow up a U.S. commercial airliner en route from Paris to Miami.

Levy believes Pearl was murdered because he came perilously close to exposing collusion between Islamic figures in Pakistan, such as Gilani, and officials of Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence agency, better known as ISI.

In Levy's view, a fringe element in ISI was helping Osama bin Laden, the founder of Al Qaeda, and funnelling nuclear secrets to Iran and North Korea.

Pearl was not the first journalist to have been kidnapped by ISI agents in Pakistan that were suspected of having links with Al Qaeda. But he was the first to have been executed, Levy says.

Being cognizant of the risks he was undertaking by travelling to Pakistan to research this book, Levy took precautions.

First, he passed himself off as an atheist, not acknowledging his Jewish background. Second, he pretended to be a French diplomat, the "special representative" of France's president.

And furthermore, Levy, a renowned philosopher, claimed he was writing a novel rather than an investigative account– a work of imagination based on reality – of Pearl's demise.

Under cover as a French diplomat, Levy tried to meet with Omar Sheikh, Pearl's kidnapper. In his quest for the meeting, Levy met with the Pakistani minister of the interior. He, in turn, referred Levy to his spokesperson, Brig. Gen. Javid Iqbal Cheema.

Levy's description of their chat speaks volumes.

"With a steely look that expressed an absence of affability, he began by asking me, 'But what are you coming to this country to look for? In every society, there are areas it's not a good idea to walk through.

"'What would you say if I, Brigadier Javid Iqbal Cheema, started messing around in the underworld of Paris or Chicago? That's what this American Jewish journalist did, he went outside the boundaries. Be careful not to make the same mistake.'"

Levy never got to see Sheikh, an unlikely terrorist. Born in Britain, Sheikh was the scion of Pakistani immigrants. A bright boy, he enrolled at the London School of Economics when he was 18. He studied mathematics and statistics.

Having interviewed his friends in Britain, Levy learned that Sheikh was nice, hard-working and not particularly religious.

And he had Jewish friends. "Jewish or Muslim, it didn't count with him," Levy quotes a Jewish friend as saying. "He didn't see the difference… And even on Israel, we could disagree on this or that aspect of the politics, but he never denied Israel's right to exist. Was he religious? Not to my knowledge. He always said, 'I have a lot of respect for your people because, like us, you are merchants.'"

Levy does not solve the mystery of Sheikh's startling transformation from regular guy to Islamic zealot. But he gets a jolting taste of the anti-Semitic animus that pervades Islamic fundamentalist circles in Pakistan.

In a madrasa (an Islamic school), an incubator of radical Islamic ideas, a teacher informs Levy that the duty of Muslims everywhere is to support jihad against "America and the Jews."

"Why the Jews?" Levy asks, feigning ignorance.

"Because they are the true terrorists. And because they lead their crusade on the soil of Palestine and Afghanistan. Zionist agents have even infiltrated here, in Pakistan. Why do you think the government accepts their orders? It should place its confidence in God. But it accepts orders from the Jews."

Another time, Levy converses with a journalist on the staff of a Pakistani Islamist newspaper whose editorial declares that the murder of Jews, all the world's Jews, is a "sacred duty" that "pleases Allah."

As the conversation proceeds, the journalist asks Levy to try to empathize with Sheikh.

"Put yourself in Sheikh's place. He sees these images of massacred Palestinians. He knows Israel is a splinter in Muslim land. And he sees an Israeli – What do you mean, 'Not an Israeli?' Ah! But yes, I beg your pardon – Pearl's father was Israeli… For me, it all adds up. Someone who has an Israeli father and grandfather is objectively Israeli.

"It's logical. So, put yourself in the place of Sheikh. He sees an Israeli who comes to provoke the Pakistanis by intervening in its affairs. We don't concern ourselves with the Israelis' affairs."

As the conversation winds down, the Pakistani journalist observes: "But, really, Mr. Levy, I hope I'm not upsetting you. I hope, at least, that you're not a Jew. It's been amusing talking philosophy with you."

In closing, Levy concludes that Pearl – whom he describes as a "martyr for freedom" – was killed "less for what he thought or did than for what he was."

He adds: "Pearl was a Jew in a country where Judaism is not a religion, and even less an identity, but another crime, another sin… He was surely a victim of modern anti-Semitism."

Free agent pitcher gets new start in Detroit

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

When Al Levine signed as a free agent with the Detroit Tigers in the off-season, he knew the club was well on its way to making itself competitive in the American League's Central Division.

With the additions of second baseman Fernando Vina, outfielder Rondell White and Levine, a middle reliever, improving on last year's disastrous 43-119 campaign was a given for a team that fell one game shy of tying the Major League record for most losses in a season.

But even with the signing of catcher Ivan Rodriguez, it would have been very hard to foresee a 4-0 start, the Tigers' best since 1985, which included a three-game sweep of the Blue Jays in Toronto to open the season.

"What's nice is that there are no expectations," said Levine, after pitching 1⅓ shutout innings in Detroit's 7-0 opening day victory over 2003 Cy Young Award winner Roy Halladay. "We just want to win and have fun. It's a whole new team, a whole new year and a whole new attitude."

The six-foot-three, 190-pound righthander who turns 36 in May is on a one-year deal at $825,000 (all figures US), about a third of major league baseball's average salary. The Tigers hold a $1.1-million option on Levine for 2005 with a $100,000 buyout.

An eight-year veteran, Levine was 3-6 with a 2.79 ERA in 54 appearances last season split between Tampa Bay and Kansas City. He was dealt to the Royals for cash at the July 31 trading deadline.

Levine had been released by St. Louis late last spring after getting hit hard during the Grapefruit League, but survived the cut this time around despite posting similar results.

"I really struggle in spring," he admitted after going 1-1 with an 8.25 ERA in 11 appearances, allowing 11 earned runs and 20 hits (four homers) over 12 innings. "I work on different things. I don't look at results and I really don't care about the numbers. I'm just looking to be healthy, strong and go from there."

Al Levine while he played for Tampa Bay

Though Levine is known primarily as a middle-reliever and set-up guy whose best pitches are sinkers and sliders, Tigers manager Alan Trammell told the Detroit Free Press he planned on using the pitcher in a lot of ways. Levine yielded a .137 batting average last season with two out and runners in scoring position.

An 11th-round pick of the Chicago White Sox in 1991, the Park Ridge, Ill., native said he had no idea where he would be staying once the team returned home from its series in Toronto.

"That's my wife's job," he said. "I let her get everything situated. I feel safe when she picks the place. There's no arguing that she doesn't like it. I'm easy like that. Otherwise you get a headache from it."

One door closes, another opens for Himelfarb

By ADAM GRACHNIK
Special to The CJN

The path to success is usually taken one step at a time, but one hockey player's journey just grew wings.

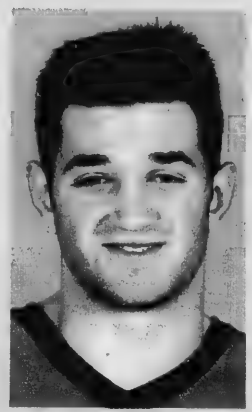
Eric Himelfarb, the 21-year-old hockey star from Thornhill, is playing with the Grand Rapids Griffins of the American Hockey League after signing a three-year deal with the Detroit Red Wings, mere days after ending his stellar junior career.

Himelfarb signed a two-way deal (one salary for suiting up with Detroit in the NHL and a lesser amount if he plays for the Wings' farm team in Grand Rapids) and earned a signing bonus. Terms of the deal weren't available.

"I'm really excited," Himelfarb said from his hotel room in Grand Rapids shortly after signing. "It's been an unbelievable and interesting couple of days."

Interesting, he explained, because on a Sunday he was packing his gear in Kingston, saying good-bye to teammates after his Ontario Hockey League Kingston Frontenacs lost in the first round of the playoffs to the Barrie Colts. The loss ended his junior career, and he didn't have a pro contract waiting.

On the Monday, in an unexpected turn of events, he was in Thornhill finalizing a contract with the Red Wings. On Tuesday, he flew to Chicago to connect to Grand Rapids and on Wednesday he played in his first professional game.



Eric Himelfarb

All in all, he was home less than 24 hours after finishing fourth in OHL scoring with a career-high 107 points.

"I never expected to play [in Grand Rapids] that first day. I thought I'd show up and meet the guys, but sure enough, I was in the lineup," he said, describing the feeling as exciting and nerve-wracking.

"I was just playing on emotion that day."

Back in Thornhill, the phone didn't stop ringing and the family was thrilled. After his little brother signed, older brother Adam went out and bought a Red Wings baseball cap.

"He put his mind and heart into a dream and he accomplished it," his mother Anne Himelfarb said. "Whether it's medical school or whatever, how many parents can watch their children do this?"

In her son's pro debut, he scored on his first shot to launch the Griffins to a 6-3 come-from-behind victory.

"I was relieved to get it over with. I got a loose puck in front and backhanded it in," he said, describing his first professional goal.

The locals were impressed. The morning after his first game, the headline in the Grand Rapids Press read, "Rookie's goal ignites Griffins."

In his fourth game, Himelfarb played in Toronto against the Roadrunners, where fellow Jewish player Michael Henrich skates. The Griffins outclassed the Roadrunners, thumping them 6-0. Himelfarb chipped in with a goal and an assist.

"There were like 50 [friends and family] watching me. It was awesome," he said.

In seven regular season games with the Griffins, the sniper had two goals, three assists and was nominated for the AHL Player of the Week award. In the Griffins' first two playoff games, both losses to the Chicago Wolves, Himelfarb had two assists, good for third place on the team.

For their part, the historic Red Wings, a franchise known for winning and succeeding, hope they've stumbled upon a gem.

"He's a character kid and comes from a good background. Those are assets for sure," said Jim Nill, the Red Wings' assistant general manager, explaining that the Wings scouted Himelfarb in at least 10 OHL games this season.

Nill said Himelfarb has fit in well, even though he hasn't been getting a lot of ice time. He said he'd get a chance to feel out the pro game in preparation for the Red Wings training camp in the fall. There he'll skate alongside a fellow Jewish player, veteran defenceman Mathieu Schneider.

Himelfarb's speed and scoring touch have followed him through his career, but adjusting to the pro game, he said, has been challenging. He's skating beside older, smarter players and the skill is better too.

As quick as he is, he can't escape his size. At 5-9, 165 pounds, he's always been labelled a small player with a big heart. That might explain why he never caught on with the Montreal Canadiens, the team that drafted him 171st overall in 2001, or the Ottawa Senators, a team that gave him an amateur tryout in the summer of 2003.

While Himelfarb can still add some mass, his size has never hampered his progress.

"I wasn't drafted very high in the OHL [or] in the NHL, so it's always nice to prove people wrong," he said.

Making tzedakah a top priority

The following interview is the first of a series looking at people doing tzedakah in Toronto.

Morgan Rosenberg makes time for tzedakah despite her very busy schedule. The CHAT graduate, who is now a full-time student at York University, takes karate classes twice a week, plays intramural sports, tutors students in math and science, is the co-vice-president of the York University pre-med society and works part-time as a genetics research assistant for the Centre of Addiction and Mental Health. Morgan, who just turned 21, knows the importance of helping others in her community. She volunteers at two different hospitals.

Every Monday morning at 8 a.m., she begins her four-hour shift at Mount Sinai Hospital. During this time, she assists doctors and nurses in the endoscopy unit.

"I get the charts ready for the doctors and help the patients get dressed," Morgan says. "I have been able to help some patients from the time they are admitted until they reach the procedure room."

Her smiling face and easy-going disposition have helped calm many patients' nerves before their procedures.

Morgan Rosenberg

Volunteers are important to Mount Sinai and help things run smoothly. Lesli Herman, Mount Sinai's volunteer resource co-ordinator, says, "Morgan is a very dedicated and reliable volunteer."

On Tuesday evenings at 5:30 p.m., Morgan goes to Bloorview MacMillan Children's Centre in North York, which runs programs for children and youth with disabilities or special needs. There she assists teens and pre-teens with recreational programming. They play games and do sensory-based activities together.

"As a Bloorview volunteer, I am sometimes the only one these children interact with who are not family, doctors or nurses," Morgan says. "When I arrive, some of the kids are bored and upset, and within 10 minutes, we are all laughing together. I do not know what condition bought them to Bloorview. I act only as a friend they can play and laugh with, and for a few hours possibly forget they are living in a rehab centre."

something

By MIRIAM PORTER

Morgan's passion for helping kids with special needs began at camp. For the past four summers, she worked at camps with special integration programs, where she helped the children perform a variety of activities. It was both challenging and fulfilling for her.

Morgan says growing up in a Jewish home with strong values helped make her the caring person she is today. Her family taught her to assist those in need.

Morgan smiles and says, "My mother is my role model. She is very caring and always encourages us to help others."

Morgan's older sister, Lara, is a volunteer at the Hospital for Sick Children.

The sisters attended a day school where tzedakah and tikkun olam (healing the world) were considered important values. Morgan's memories of Grade 1 include her Hebrew class performing in a play for the seniors living at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"It's important to think of other people and do things that will be a benefit to them," she says.

This philosophy has proved to be constant throughout Morgan's life. These days, she is working toward becoming a doctor and will be taking the MCAT exam in the summer. But as her busy schedule continues, so does her dedication to making tzedakah a top priority.

A Toronto family's courage

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

In 2002, 862,000 visitors entered Israel – a 29 per cent drop compared to 2001. Fortunately, this trend is beginning to reverse.

Curiously, however, there are always a handful of Jews who make the trek to Israel despite the possibility of seeing terrorism up close.

URBAN WRITER

Paul and Susan Lindzon, a Toronto Jewish couple, are one example. Last fall, during perilous times in Israel, they decided to travel there for Pesach with three of their four children. I wondered why they weren't scared.

"We got a little nervous when the Israelis killed the Hamas leader," Susan said. "You see the picture of the guys with the bayonets, and if another attack would have happened, we would have cancelled."

Susan's expressions reflected a powerful maternal trepidation for the safety of her children. She added, "If something had, God forbid, happened, I would never have been able to live with myself."

Fathers might relate differently to their children's safety – perhaps more stoically.

"I was very driven for some reason for my family to be with my Israeli cousins for Pesach. I never wavered once," said Paul, who is an importer of shearling coats. "Besides, I travel to places more dangerous than Israel for my work."

Jared, 16, expressed a beautiful faith in his parents when asked about his fear.

"My mother was an Israeli mother for a few days, and I wasn't really scared that much, because she wouldn't let me get into a dangerous situation. She was scared for me," he said. "Besides, what are the odds of being in a terrorist attack?"

Russell, 13, is a determined teenager, with sparkling eyes and a dishevelled mop of hair.

"The only fear I felt was when we landed in Israel. But as soon as we got into the trip, I wasn't afraid anymore. The Israelis were so happy we were there and so was I," he said.

I was curious about what images of Israel appear in the inventive mind of a little girl. The Lindzons' daughter, Brooky is 6½ and terribly yummy. Susan and Paul wisely prepped her before their departure, telling her she would see soldiers with guns, but they were there to protect them.

"One night we were on our balcony in Eilat, however, and I pointed to Saudi Arabia, Jordan and Egypt," Susan said. "Brooky got scared, I guess feeling less protected. I comforted her and assured her we were OK. Her fears went away."

I don't know why some Jews are stymied by real or perceived fears about Israel, while others are not.

It was obvious, however, the Lindzons refused to be deterred. Maybe it's that Paul and Susan were taught courage by their parents. Perhaps it stemmed from their very deep and profound love for Israel as a Jewish homeland, and an understanding that risks accompany love.

"As I get older and see what's going on in the world, I see Israel is our home," Paul said. "You take it away and what do you have?"

Maybe their children's Jewish education on Zionism and stories of Jewish bravery, a sound investment, propelled their parents forward. Jared said he felt "honoured" to visit Israel and Brooky called the Kotel "the golden place in the city" and proudly said it was where the Temple stood.

Nevertheless, the Lindzons made the trip, returned safely, thank God, and have no regrets. Despite this, Paul concluded our interview by saying, "If I told you I didn't breath a sigh of relief when we landed in Toronto, I would be lying. But I was never really afraid for myself or my kids."

Mothers are different. Susan looked at Paul and said, "I never told you this, but every time an Egged bus went by, I said a quiet prayer for us."

Jewish courage comes in many forms.

"Chairing the run is a perfect combination of my passion for running, personal commitment to contributing to the community and my affection for and long history of involvement with Mount Sinai Hospital."
Barbara Bregman, Co-Chair

"As a woman, a mother, a daughter, a sister, a wife, a friend, a physician and an educator, I know the impact Mount Sinai has had on families in the Jewish community.

We have made great strides in the diagnosis and treatment of breast cancer but there is so much more to be done. This is a unique opportunity to bring your family together to participate in the Run/Walk. Not only will it raise funds for the Hospital, but it is a wonderful opportunity for families to come out and show their support.

We all have busy lives, and it is easy to become complacent. But complacency will not fund the fights that need to be fought. I am proud to be involved and hopefully excite others to do the same. Together we do make a difference."

Everything you ever wanted to know about kitchens and bathrooms

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

It is often said that the kitchen is the heart of the home. Just as it's smart to keep the heart in shape, so too a beautiful kitchen can bring a lift to the whole house.

Laurentide Kitchens (416-736-7300) has been building better kitchens for over 30 years. With computerized equipment and dedication to detail, they produce quality cabinetry at their Hamilton facility.

A family-run company, vice-president Lewis Czobit explains what they do best. "We provide a full-service product, everything from design to manufacturing to delivery to installation, complete project management."

Using environmentally friendly materials, they build their kitchens and cabinets in addition to applying their own finishes. Thermofoil, a highly durable yet economical material, is used in their paint and finishes.

Laurentide Kitchens also applies its skill to other parts of the house. The company installs bathroom tops in laminate, granite or corian. Especially for resale value, it is often noted that better kitchens and bathrooms can help to sell a house.

Currently Czobit has noticed that wood preferences are leaning towards pine, oak, maple and cherry. Kitchens are especially popular when finished in a maple wood species with custom finishes such as eye-catching crown moldings. "People are looking for unique kitchens, something that will reflect their style," adds Czobit.

The tone of a room can be set by the subtle nuances of the colour of its walls. Coulters Mill Paint (905-760-8118) is a Benjamin Moore signature store, housing a world of colours.

Manager Paul Tane explains that a trip to this store means getting "in-depth knowledge and expert advice, plus the personal attention you deserve. We're really focused on customer service."

It is staffed with experienced colour consultants who are there to help customers with specific projects.

For young families with the potential for many fingerprinted walls, this year saw the launch of Ulti-Matte paint, which has proven to be successful. Traditionally, in order to get the benefit of a washable surface, people were limited to glossy paint. But, adds Tane, Ulti-Matte is a washable flat paint enabling customers "the beauty of flat paint for today's busy lifestyle."

Decorative finishes to be added have also evolved into a wide range of different applications such as shadow striping and strié. There is a complimentary look for any type of home.

Coulter's Mill Paint carries the full Benjamin Moore product line-up, wallpaper and window coverings, and is also bringing in a variety of new product lines all relating to home décor for spring. A very unique line of window hardware includes tie-backs and rods in a hand-made high-end product.

This summer the colours and flavours of Tuscany will be featured along with in-store promotions and ongoing seminars.

Once the paint and permanent fixtures are in place, it's time to begin concentrating on furnishings. Regency Interiors (416-661-9100) has a longstanding record in designing and creating custom-made pieces to be cherished. President Sal Di Meglio notes "we've been serving many generations." Yet even with such a history of productivity, no two pieces are ever the same.

Many customers are coming back after enjoying a piece by Regency Interiors for many years, now looking for help in their need to scale down for condominium living. Older units can be refashioned to accommodate storage where needed, a beautiful marriage of form and function. "We get a lot of requests for one-of-a-kind special woods such as zebra, walnut or anegri," adds Di Meglio.

They are known for their stylish wall units and bedroom armoires. These armoires are designed to accommodate a stereo, with a combination of drawers and retractable doors. With a remote control and the push of a button, the T.V. comes out of the motorized cabinet. Complicated sound systems such as those with surround sound and different speakers are concealed behind exquisite wood craftsmanship.

Regency Interiors also does cabinet work for the bathroom. Working with a designer or architect's drawings, they can take a project from paper to reality with skill and versatility. Designing custom vanities for the bathroom, they can use different veneers or a faux finish, to create an antique look.

Amy Henderson, marketing manager for TAPS Bath Centre, (416-785-7224) has just returned from the Kitchen and Bath Show in Chicago. Commenting on some of the current trends, she says that "many people go to antique shops looking for washstands that can be converted into a bathroom vanity. They are often too short, however, and not deep enough to accept most basins. The solution is offered by American Standard/Porcher, who has developed furniture pieces with fireclay tops that are both beautiful and functional."

For 20 years, TAPS showroom has offered all brand name products of the highest quality to designers, contractors and the public. Their stock is offered at significant savings, due to the huge volume in which TAPS purchases. They sell over 10,000 different products, representing more than 200 manufacturers the world over. As Henderson adds, "our staff are very knowledgeable in the product and can walk you through the design process. That's the advantage of a boutique store."

A regular bathroom can be converted to create a spa-like ambiance. Custom showers are created with popular fittings such as thermostatic control to customize your water temperature, and hand shower or body sprays can be positioned to massage sore areas such as the lower back and thighs.

Also available are soothing whirlpools, shower enclosures plus pedestal, toilets, bidets, bathroom and kitchen faucets. At TAPS, they sell almost everything, including the kitchen sink!

Pools - a country club in your backyard

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

If you're going to have a swimming pool installed, planning is paramount, as people who don't spend enough time planning may be disappointed with the result.

And once a pool is installed, it's pretty hard to move it, jokes Marvin Betz of Betz Pools (416-798-7955, www.betzpools.com).

Betz Pools specializes in vinyl-liner and concrete in-ground pools. Vinyl-liner in-ground pools have a shorter life than concrete in-ground pools and are cheaper. A vinyl-liner pool from Betz is in the $25,000 to $50,000 range, while concrete pools start at $50,000.

Heating a pool can extend the season and solar blankets keep the heating costs down

Vinyl-liner pools come in kits, which Betz Pools installs. The kits are available in standard styles, including kidney and L-shapes and rectangular, with several variations on each of the shapes.

Betz says he has upgraded the structure of the vinyl-liner pool his company offers. "We had it upgraded to make a stronger structure," he says. "Our customer is going to have a long-lasting pool."

While a vinyl-liner pool can be customized to a certain extent, a concrete in-ground pool can be completely customized for a backyard, and design-wise, almost anything goes.

Betz is the second generation to work in his family's business and he says the concrete in-ground pools the company installed 65 years ago have stood the test of time. "My first choice is concrete," he notes.

Lot size and where the sun falls in the backyard determine where a pool should be located. A family's activities may also be factors in determining pool design.

Betz says he installs rectangular pools for those who swim lengths. Water sports such as volleyball require a deep end. Most of his customers want a deep end in their pool, but he says that's not important to everyone.

Before pool construction can begin, it's necessary to get city permits, including building and electrical permits, which Betz Pools obtains for their customers.

Heating a pool can extend the season and solar blankets keep the heating costs down. Most pools in the city are heated by natural gas, which Betz says is quickest – "the fastest way to heat the pool from 60 degrees to 80 degrees" – and the most cost effective. "If you didn't use an insulated blanket, it would cost $2,000 a season. With a blanket, it's $500 to $1,000."

Betz Pools offers a landscaping service that includes patio design, shrubs, trees and lighting. "We create an entire backyard environment," Betz says.

They provide pool maintenance, including pool opening, weekly service and winterizing at the end of the season. But Betz says it's not difficult to maintain your own pool. Automatic pool cleaners are available, and to ensure that the chemicals in the pool are balanced, his company can test the water.

Installing a pool requires research and planning.

Spend the summer at your own pool

Betz says that if you're building a pool, it doesn't cost much more to add a spa. Spas used to be called hot tubs, after the wooden-style tubs, and the name stuck. "Spa" is the term preferred by the industry today.

A concrete spa connected to a pool starts at $9,000, as opposed to a free-standing concrete spa, which starts at $15,000. Acrylic spas start at $6,000. Most people prefer circular spas that accommodate four to six people.

Betz pools offers a five-year "bumper-to-bumper" guarantee on a pool and spa package. "That means everything is guaranteed for five years," Betz says.

Like Betz Pools, Bonvista Pools (905-475-6980) is a family business. Now headed by 33-year-old Melissa Brown, one of five children of the late Robert Brown, the 35-year-old company specializes in in-ground concrete pool and spas.

Of the Brown children, Melissa always showed the most interest in the family business. She started working for the company at 16. "I was the keenest one," she says. "My brother Peter is working with me now and he's only been in for six years."

Brown says Bonavista's concrete pools, which start at $35,000, last for decades. Pools the company installed 35 years ago still look as good as they did then and have required only cosmetic touch-ups. "The structure is as good as 35 years ago."

Pool design is rarely fashioned around family activities, Brown says, unless the owners want a lap pool for swimming lengths. "A pool is designed to fit a backyard more than an activity. If the family has a lot of kids, they tend to go with a larger rather than a smaller pool."

Installing a pool can take several weeks and Brown says the rule of thumb is to anticipate one week's construction time for every $10,000 spent.

Bonavista offers a variety of landscape and design options, including waterfalls, for the pool area. "It comes down to the homeowner's desire and what they want in the background," Brown says.

Bonavista's services include pool openings, closing and maintenance. She agrees with Betz about do-it-yourself pool maintenance, that cleaning the filter, testing the water, which should be done weekly, and adding chemicals can be done by the owner.

The company gives a 10-year warranty on the pool's shell only, with the remainder depending on manufacturers' warranties.

Bona Vista offers in-ground and portable spas. A portable spa is for someone who wants to take it to the cottage in the summer and bring it home for the winter, she says. "Or have it close to the pool in the summer and close to the house in the winter."

She says most in-ground spas Bona Vista builds are connected to swimming pools. One advantage to that is that you don't have to test two bodies of water since the water in the pool is the same as the water in the spa.

Bonavista's portable spas start at $3,000, in-ground spas connected to a pool start at $9,000 and stand-alone concrete spas start at $15,000.

The company offers a year's warranty on in-ground spas, and portable spas are covered by manufacturers' guarantees.

Brown recalls that as a child her family met in the spa at the end of a day, to chat and relax.

"A spa is wonderful for your body and makes you sleep really well," she says.

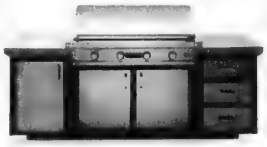
Patio & on the go barbecues

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

When most people think of furniture, sofas, chaise lounges and kitchen tables come to mind. But the interior of the house isn't the only spot that needs some attention. Backyard patio furniture can be an important addition to your garden.



Sydney Brown from GP Products (905-709-1162) says that it is important to keep several things in mind when looking for backyard furniture.

• Think about size

How many people do you want the table to seat? Should it be round or rectangular? How much space do you have to fill? GP Products has tables ranging from an intimate 24-in. round table that seats two, to a 102-in. rectangular table for 12, so it's important to know what will fit best on your patio. Alternatively, you may just need a few chairs or only a table to fill in some empty space in the yard. Don't feel like you need to buy the whole set.

• Think about maintenance

An ideal backyard furniture ensemble should be maintenance-free, because nobody really wants to lug the furniture into the garage in the fall or scrape icicles off the table all winter. Aluminum is best in this department, says Brown. "It can be left outside all year round. Winter doesn't bother it."

• Think about your budget

Prices can vary depending on the size and style.

When it comes to design and durability, Brown recommends selecting either cast or tubular aluminum. Brown has seen cast aluminum grow in popularity over the past few years. Tubular aluminum is the type with sling seats for chairs, so you don't need separate cushions to sit on. "They are impervious to water, dry instantly and never fade," says Brown.

Aluminum also has the added benefit of being lightweight, so there's no need to worry about strained backs and pulled muscles from lugging the chairs around the yard. Plus aluminum never rusts. "You can probably leave it to your great-grandchildren," jokes Brown.

Is there anything that Brown won't recommend? "Avoid steel because of rust," he says. Also avoid resin, the material used in the ubiquitous white plastic chairs. Acid rain and air pollution turn the white to a dull grey that won't come out, even with vigorous scrubbing.

A tasty addition to the backyard furniture is a barbecue, and most people use their barbecues year-round, says Neil Patel of Barbeque Boys (416-588-6293).

Whether you're upgrading the rusty old clunker or thinking about buying a barbeque for the first time, Patel suggests keeping a few things in mind.

• Check out the warranty

A good barbecue should have at least a five-year warranty on the burner, a 10-year warranty on the cooking grill and a two-year warranty on the whole barbecue.

•Look for stainless steel burners and grills

Unlike cast iron, stainless steel is easier to maintain, doesn't rust, and distributes heat better over the whole grill. Stainless steel grills are also easier to clean.

• Think about fuel

The big question about fuel is whether to use propane, natural gas or charcoal. Most barbecues use natural gas because houses are natural-gas equipped. It burns cleaner, never runs out, and is safer because there are no trips to the gas station to fill up the tank with propane.

Propane, on the other hand, is pressurized and therefore more volatile. Plus, because it comes from the gas station, there's the chance that a tank can run out during a big party, says Patel.

Few people use charcoal for barbecuing now, but it has one distinct advantage. "When it comes to taste, there is nothing that beats charcoal," says Patel.

Like any other machine, barbecues need yearly maintenance inspections. Check the hose to make sure there are no leaks. Raccoons and other critters have been known to gnaw through the gas hose, says Patel. The ceramic rocks should be changed every year, and the grill needs to be washed regularly because the food is cooked directly on it.

Another important factor to consider when buying a barbecue, says Joel Waisglass of Sobie's Barbecues (416-224-2526), is to think about what you want to cook on it. If you plan on grilling more than hot dogs and hamburgers, then a barbecue with a side grill might be best suited for you. Waisglass suggests barbecuing fish and vegetables as well as the traditional meats.

But the most important thing about barbecuing, regardless of the grill you buy, is having fun with it, says Waisglass. Mix and match foods. Combine random sauces. (Waisglass suggests pouring beer on your meat: "I made beer chicken on the barbecue last night, and it was so tasty, my wife and kids thought I was a hero.") Anything goes on the barbecue.

Variable or fixed? Our advice to the real players

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

It's the classic mortgage decision: variable or fixed. Plummeting interest rates may help steer the homeowner in the right direction but the debate rages on.

"Interest rates are probably at a two-decade low," says Art Appleberg of Northwood Mortgage (416-969-8130). "In the 1980s, the interest was high, hovering at 11 per cent for a five-year plan. Today, people can get a 25-year mortgage at six per cent interest, and that's amazing."

While Appleberg suggests a fixed mortgage – in which the interest rate remains locked from the date of purchase – around 90 per cent of his clients opt for variable rate mortgages (the interest paid is priced off the major banks' changing prime rate). He has noticed younger homeowners find variable appealing, and older buyers enjoy the security of a fixed mortgage rate.

Appleberg says prospective homeowners should evaluate their acceptance of risk. "Do you want a quick low rate right now or do you want security long-term?" He tells his clients that they should remember buying a mortgage isn't playing the stock market – "This is your home you're dealing with," he stresses.

Irwin Igra, investment adviser for IPC Securities (416-565-2732), suggests a variable mortgage with a twist: "Make payments as though you're in a five-year mortgage plan," he says. "Don't pay the minimum, because then you're not knocking off any principal."

But as with many financial decisions, individual personalities can determine the outcome. "If you're the type to worry about rates jumping up and down, go for a fixed five-year plan," Igra says. "If there's anytime for a fixed plan, it's now."

Igra predicts rates won't increase higher than eight per cent, and most financial experts believe that rates will go up sometime in early 2005. Appleberg asks rhetorically, "How much lower can it go?"

He suggests speaking to an investment adviser before diving into any mortgage plan. Criteria to discuss include job security, payment options, and comfort level. Appleberg advises new homeowners "not to rush into anything." Find a mortgage broker through word-of-mouth referrals, he adds.

Monica Weissman

Apart from various mortgage plans, insurance should also be a consideration, according to Monica Weissmann, a financial adviser with Edward Jones (905-889-8535). Since houses are important investments, she says, it's integral for homeowners to own and control the mortgage insurance policy, as opposed to a bank being the beneficiary.

"There are no benefits going with the bank," Weissmann says flatly.

She outlines the benefit of portability. "If you own your insurance, you can move around and seek better rates without losing your coverage." Weissmann is prepared for criticism. "Some people say they don't see the value in insurance covering their mortgages. But I see it as the best return-of-investment if the need arises, worse comes to worse."

Igra offers another unique option: setting up a mortgage through an RRSP. Instead of making interest payments to the bank, the money is funneled to personal RRSPs, he says. "The downside is that your money is tied up with the mortgage, but I'm betting mortgages do better than Nortel shares."

Appleberg doesn't see the value in that feature. "We offered it in the early 1990s and only a small percentage grabbed it," he says. "It's best for sophisticated investors with self-directed RRSPs, which are quite rare."

So looking at the mortgage picture, which option is highly recommended?With tongue planted firmly in cheek, Appleberg says, "The best mortgage is no mortgage at all."

Crystal clear water in every faucet

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Many of us buy bottled water or use a jug filter or single tap filter to purify municipal water.

Now, crystal clear, great-tasting water can run through every faucet in one's home, with the recently introduced Maytag Central Water Filtration System (1-800-688-2002, www.maytagwater.ca) manufactured by Zenon Environmental Inc.

"The system uses Zenon's patented membrane ultrafiltration technology that has been trusted and proven for decades," says Kevin Zicherman of the consumer products division.

Used in large-scale drinking water plants and cruise ships worldwide, it is the same waer filtration technology that helped resolve the Walkerton and Collingwood outbreaks, he says.

One year ago, says Zicherman, Zenon partnered with Maytag Canada to offer the system to homeowners.

The Maytag Central Water Filtration System effectively blocks and removes up to 99.99999 per cent of bacteria, up to 99.9 per cent of viruses and parasites, and eliminates cloudiness from water while allowing healthy, natural minerals to pass through the system.

An activated carbon pre-filter absorbs chlorine, which improves the taste and odour of municipal drinking water. The filtration system also helps to reduce sulphur smell if the water contains small quantities of the substance, but it won't remove the fluoride in the water.

The filtration system runs off existing water pressure without requiring any electrical power to filter water. Even during a power failure, filtered water continues to run through every faucet.

Once the Maytag Central Water Filtration System is installed at the point at which water enters the house, the system begins to work without a start or stop switch. If the main water valve is open, the inlet and outlet valves are open and the bypass valve is closed, the system is on, and filtering water soundlessly.

Backflushing itself daily, the system controller automatically flushes impurities down the drain at a pre-set time selected by the homeowner. The cleaning cycle takes about five minutes and uses less than four gallons to clean the system.

The municipal filtration system starts at about $3,999. Service life is expected to be 10 years or more, depending on the quality of water sources, Zicherman says. Maytag offers a pro-rated five-year warranty on the ultrafiltration membrane and a two-year warranty on parts and labour.

New flooring puts new spring into your steps

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

The right flooring can make a room come to life.

Joe Rivietz, president of Riviera Flooring (905-738-4588) knows this well. Commenting on his full-service flooring business, he states, "we use good materials and we have excellent installers. We really look after people."

Selling and laying hardwood floors is a big part of this business, and they are experienced at installing floors for condominiums. From start to finish, they do all the work, lifting the carpet, moving furniture, laying the hardwood floor and moving the furniture back. They even dispose of the old carpet.

Riviera Flooring will also install your laminate or carpet. Adds Rivietz, "we don't just sell the carpet, we service it, we install it and we have an excellent reputation. We bring it in direct. After 25 years, I don't buy from distributors." Lower prices are passed on to the customer in the absence of a middleman. They also custom design area rugs, beveling and carving them out to order.

A completely waterproof laminate is a high-pressure product also available through Riviera Flooring. Its beauty is in its simplicity as it is completely modular. The individual pieces click together, much like Lego, so if there is a problem piece it can be lifted out and replaced seamlessly.

You can even take it with you if you move.

Trust Flooring (416-745-8518) is Toronto's largest flooring store, and as sales manager Loren Kruger notes, with a name like that, "we have to really prove ourselves. We're known for our service and our breadth of product line."

They carry specialty items such as exotic woods that are not found in most stores, and their tile selection includes imports from Italy, Greece, India and Jerusalem. Their Jerusalem limestone is the product you see if you go to Jerusalem.

Their showroom, around 8,000 square feet, contains displays illustrating the different ways to use the flooring products. There is even a free on-staff interior designer to help with decisions, or to solve any design dilemmas.

Carpets come in diverse, colours, patterns, textures and piles. Kruger adds that Berbers in beige tones with accents are now popular.

There has even been a renewed interest in shag carpeting, which is now a shorter, high-end product.

Trust Flooring is a Stain Master® flooring centre and can offer warranties that other retailers can't. It is made up of a like-minded larger group of companies, dedicated to improving the experience of purchasing flooring products.

It is experience that Arthur Selyan, owner of Selyan Rugs (416-781-2030), brings to his interest in flooring. Established by Selyan in 1946, he has seen the business change over more than 50 years.

"We specialize in the new cork flooring that is coming out now, which we use in condominiums," notes Selyan.

Cork is a completely natural product, and is a sound environmental choice because it comes from renewable resources.

It acts as a good sound and heat insulator, and as a pressure and shock absorber. Especially in condominiums, it can drastically reduce noise, which could reverberate through the concrete. It comes in a full range of colours and is completely fire-proof, he says.

Selyan Rugs is fully stocked to meet all flooring needs. A member of the buying group known as Floors-First, they can offer exceptional prices, a written guarantee with their product and a written manufacturer's warranty.

Carpets warm and comfort any room

Selyan Rugs only sells pre-finished hardwood floors, which can be seen in their showroom. As Selyan explains, "we have the actual material in the flooring, not just a small sample." So one can really get a feel for the look of the flooring.

With the dominance of hardwood floors, Oriental rugs are more popular than ever. Currently, Selyan says, the trend in Oriental rugs is leaning towards Chobe rugs. Decorators have, in particular, moved towards this antique finish.

For a different look in area rugs, look to Dominion Rugs (416-485-9488). This is where designers such as Brian Gluckstein and Jeffrey Douglas come for one-of-a-kind pieces, sure to become precious family heirlooms. Rugs by designers Barbara Barry and famed architect Frank Lloyd Wright are represented. The Wright rugs are "a licensed product, put out by his foundation; an exclusive," explains president Ben Baum. "We really specialize in fine area rugs and broadloom.

"Today, texture is the biggest thing; patterned carpet is big now." With tone-on-tone design, a lot of sisal carpet is sold. The look is available in wool or synthetics, for easier care.

With over 15,000 samples of rugs to choose from, Dominion Rugs has the biggest selection in Toronto. Their Wilton Collection – English rugs in a floral pattern – is also the largest. After 57 years and with an alignment to an international design guild, (a buying agent for several independent stores), they get access to an exclusive product at attainable prices.

Baum notes, as well, that the latest rugs are made with vegetable dyes or in a needlepoint style. Tea-stained looking Aubussons are marked by their subtlety and air of tradition. "We import from Nepal, Pakistan, India and China. We're known for our service and quality. That's why we've lasted so long."

Home security provides peace of mind

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

Everyone wants to feel secure, especially at home. With state-of-the-art technology and good old-fashioned customer service, Into-Electronics Inc. (416-445-8274) can ensure your home remains your safe haven.

Their custom-designed service can help to ensure peace of mind regarding many potential hazards of home life.

Into-Electronics Inc. can monitor a home for flooding or sump pump problems, gas leaks, carbon monoxide and smoke, and can also secure doors and windows.

Rod Wechsler, one of the company's chief officers, explains the mandate behind the company: "We don't give away things for free and lock people into contracts; we don't believe the client will get what they want [that way]." They sit down with the client and find out what's important to them.

There are different methods of bypassing the alarm to keep the house monitored without breaking Shabbat, he says. For example, wired window screens enable a window to be opened and allow fresh air in, without disturbing the current flow of the alarm.

Into-Electronics installs commercial security systems in multi-million dollar homes, average homes and everything in between. Currently, they have installed and are monitoring systems for the Jerome Diamond Adolescent Centre, Bialik Hebrew Day School and Holy Blossom Temple.

Wechsler is able to use his background and knowledge in installing touchscreen systems for lighting, security and heating to enhance the company services. They can even arrange to have your phone system run on a radio frequency, should an intruder cut the phone line.

"We believe in service, it's a big part of our business," adds Wechsler. As demonstrated by the company rule, all calls are returned within 24 hours.

For over 25 years, Pre-Lock Security Services (416-773-5625) has diligently protected its clientele across the GTA and on up to cottage country.

Owner Paul Seidman explains that the company provides home alarms, but also physical security. Fortified locks such as Medeco dead bolts or Mul-T-lock, which is made in Israel, are unique in that their keys cannot be duplicated. The blank keys for these dead bolts are only available through a registered locksmith. It literally gives the homeowner "key control" of their home.

Seidman explains, "I like to look at the circle of protection. Security literally starts right at the front door. We work on the principle that it's better to keep the intruder outside and provide a physical presence right from the start, and avoid the challenge of dealing with the intruder later."

Physical security can also be implemented with bars on basement windows. But these are not the institutional-looking thick black bars of yesteryear. These bars can be quite attractive; many have a design or curve to them. They can even be fashioned in a 9-in. by 12 in. design, mimicking the look of a French window.

The company is very good at what they do. For 6 years in a row, they have received the Consumer's Choice Award for being no.1 in alarm and locksmith services. They are also an accredited member of the Association of Ontario Locksmiths. Their policy of protection can best be summed up by their motto: "Real security under lock and key." All Pre-Lock employees are bonded and insured.

Rod Wechsler

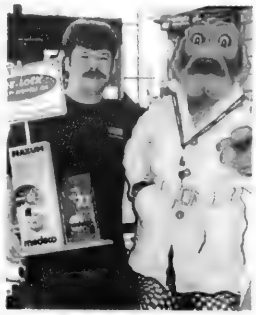
AlarmForce (416-445-2001) is a security system provider with a distinct difference. Their systems are monitored by live operators who forcefully address the intruder should one enter your home.

A siren doesn't tell a thief if a house is being monitored. As Alan Goodley, national sales manager explains, "we monitor with live two-way voice communication. People ignore [sirens] and the thieves ignore them as well. When a thief breaks into an AlarmForce protected home, we threaten the thief. The thief knows this is a live person telling him 'we know you're there and the authorities are on the way.'"

The two-way method of communication enables the AlarmForce operator to hear what's going on at the location as well. If there is screaming or cries of distress, they can quickly alert the appropriate authorities to have help immediately dispatched.

The security system uses phones as keypads, which allows clients to have multiple keypads throughout their home. The phone is wired to send a panic signal as well. A trap area with a motion sensor at the point of entry is created. It triggers the alarm within seconds, yet can be set up to be pet friendly as well. The sensors can be set at a specific height to enable a pet to roam the home freely while the alarm is on, without setting it off.

AlarmForce has 30 offices coast to coast and their systems come with a full warranty on the equipment, so if it malfunctions, it's fixed at no cost. With top service, a quality product and a record of customer satisfaction, it could be said that AlarmForce is truly a force to be reckoned with.



Pre-lock offers security

Secure your belongings with proper insurance

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Building a new home is a major undertaking, and it's good to know that insurance companies will insure a home that is under construction if the policy is purchased before construction begins.

"The risk for the insurance company is the greatest at the end of a project," says Jeff Goldstein, vice-president of Paisley Manor Insurance (416-380-2211, www.paisleymanor.com). "That is why you can't get insurance after you start the project."

On the first day of construction, an insurance company doesn't have much liability if there was a fire, for instance, but by the end of construction of one million dollar home, the company's risk would be greatest. "Every day that goes by, the price of the project increases," Goldstein says.

He says that prior to construction one ought to consult with their insurance broker to discuss safety issues. If the insurance company says you need a fence or guards on the site, he notes, it's best to know before you start so you can build the expense into the budget.

Goldstein adds that one ought to discuss the coverage of building material with his or her broker. It's possible to have liability only – which means the building's owner absorbs the cost of any damages – and not to insure any construction material. "If you're doing a full construction project, a prudent person would go the full nine yards," he says, "and get maximum coverage."

Along with the many new homes going up these days, quite a few people are renovating older homes. It's important to inform the insurance company about renovations because to the company a renovation is a change in material risk. "If you do something to your house and you don't tell your insurance company," Goldstein says, "you stand the risk of not being covered."

> Premium discounts are also available if one pays a higher deductible

Any changes in circumstances, including building a rental apartment in the home, opening a home business or even installing an alarm system, should be reported to your broker.

Goldstein says that a home with an alarm system is safer than it was previously and safety reduces the insurance company's exposure, so having the alarm would probably get the homeowner a discount on his or her premium.

Premium discounts are also available if one pays a higher deductible, and in condos and apartments, discounts are given for various levels of security, such as whether a concierge is on duty in the reception area.

Condo insurance is similar to tenant insurance. However, a person who owns a condo also owns a percentage of the building and the cost of condo repairs as a result of a claim is borne by the unit owner. The owner's insurance policy would cover those costs.

> 'Cheapest is never the best'

Paisley Manor Insurance Brokers, which celebrates its 50th anniversary next year, is one of the city's premiere brokers, serving high net-worth clients. Founded by Irv Paisley, the brokerage represents such insurance companies as Royal and SunAlliance Insurance Company, Guarantee Company of North America, American International Groups (AIG) and The Chubb Group of Insurance Companies.

Paisley's clients can get coverage that is broader than is available anywhere else, including such additions as home-invasion and earthquake insurance. Paisley's policies reimburse the policyholder the cash value of a stolen or damaged item without the need to replace. With most home, condo and tenant packages, the policyholder has to pay for the cost of replacing an item and then the insurance company reimburses him or her.

Jewellery, silverware, furs and artwork are insured separately, and Paisley Manor offers breakage insurance for collectibles. If a cleaning person breaks a precious vase, the policyholder will be compensated.

The Chubb Group of Insurance Companies does complimentary in-home appraisals of houses and condos to make sure the homeowner has adequate insurance coverage.

Goldstein says his clients, who on average have homes that are worth two million dollars, are concerned with how well they are covered by their insurance policies rather than the cost of the policies. "Cheapest is never the best," he says. "You can't buy insurance by price."

Seniors can retire with all the amenities

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Think of all the amenities available on a luxury liner coursing its way through the Caribbean or Mediterranean Seas. Need your hair done? No problem, there are hairdressers on board.

Like a quick nip during Happy Hour? C'mon down, the bar is open.

Ready for dinner? The elegantly appointed dining room is serving three meals a day.

Need help from a medical practitioner? Just call down, there's 24-hour medical care available.

Want to work out? The exercise room has recumbent bikes, a treadmill and other equipment at your disposal.

Add in social activities, entertainment, outings, a quiet reading area and comfortable rooms with a view, and the facilities available at Hazelton Place and Kensington Place bring a luxury cruise ship to mind.

Elegance and amenities are two of the latest trends in retirement living, with both facilities offering guests the kind of lifestyle one would more commonly associate with a cruise or a stop in a luxury hotel.

For those in moderately good health, retirement has never been so good.

At Hazelton Place, a 156-suite building on Avenue Road near Yorkville, the selling points are the quality of the facility, the amenities, medical care if needed, and a location for residents comfortable in the downtown area. Hazelton Place embodies a recent approach to retirement living, said Nadia Rahman, general manager of the facility. "As people age, they have high expectations. They don't want a retirement residence that's old, dark or run down."

"I think people, seniors in particular, are a more educated consumer," said Marlene White, community relations manager for Kensington Place, located on Sheppard Avenue between Dufferin and Bathurst.

"I find from the questions clients are asking now, [people] have come to terms with retirement living. They stayed in their houses as long as possible, but if retirement residences offer more activities, that can be attractive. Today, senior residences are fun."

This page's photos courtesy Kensington Place

In addition, Kensington stresses wellness for its patrons and offers assisted living services in the privacy of the resident's own suite. Retirement living in a seniors' residence combines independence and privacy, full meal service, medical assistance, friendships, activities and excursions, she added.

Kensington is slated to open for business in June. In the meantime, it offers nine different suites for viewing. When completed, the 103-suite building will offer rooms ranging in size from 380 to 790 square feet. Seventy-four will be one-bedroom apartments, 19 will be studios and 10 will be the larger two-bedroom layout.

Rent ranges from $2,750 per month to $4,950, and that includes three meals a day, a parking spot, weekly housekeeping and laundry services.

Kensington will observe Jewish dietary laws, though it will not have a mashgiach on site, White said.

So far, the facility is 30 per cent rented.

At Hazelton, which has been in operation for 3½ years, all meals are offered in a dining room that is open to the public, facing Avenue Road.

Focus on style, comfort and security

Apartments range in size from 410 square feet to more than 1,000 square feet in studio, one-bedroom and two-bedroom configurations. The majority are one-bedroom apartments. Thirty per cent of the residents are couples, 70 per cent are single. The average age is 82, but clients range in age from 61 to 96.

Prices range from $3,000 per month to $7,000 per month, depending on the size of the apartment and the extra services required, such as daily housekeeping versus the standard weekly service.

Nursing staff is available 24-hours-a-day and there is a clinic on site. A physician visits three times a week, while a chiropodist is in the building twice a month.

Hazelton offers two different levels of care. "Independent" residents are able to take care of themselves, but assistance with medication administration is available.

"Service plus" clients require "a little additional care," Rahman said. For instance, those with cognitive impairment or lack of mobility have suites on the second floor where care by a doctor and nurse is readily available.

Residents must provide a complete physician's statement outlining their health history and each resident must undergo an assessment to determine if they come within Hazelton's purview.

Once they're in, there's plenty to do. Outings to the nearby Royal Ontario Museum are available, as are day trips to Niagara Falls. On site activities include dances, shows, arts and crafts classes, computer lessons and cooking classes.

With today's aging population of active people, "people expect their quality of life shouldn't change if they move," Rahman said.

At Kensington, tai chi, yoga and other classes are offered. Each floor features a thematic lounge with unique motifs. One will be the Pebble Beach lounge, with a golf motif. Another will be the Bal Harbor, with a nautical theme.

An in-house doctor is available and residents can take advantage of the building's spa and hair dressing facilities. A "Tuscany open kitchen" is open on the penthouse floor for special occasions and the rooftop barbecue is popular during the summer.

Kensington Place is being constructed by Forum Development and Amandus Developments and will be managed by Chartwell Senior Care Services. Deena Pantalone, a partner at Forum, said a hallmark of the development is that it avoided an "institutional approach."

This pages photos courtesy of Hazelton Place

Stressing that Kensington is not a nursing home, she said extra care will be provided residents in their own suites, if needed.

The developers believe the demand for such a facility in the neighbourhood is high. It is particularly attractive to North York residents who enjoy the area and wish to remain close to shopping at Yorkdale and Bayview Village.

Hazelton Place is owned by the B.C. Teachers Pension Fund and is managed by Diversicare, Rahman said.

Heat your home
efficiently with a Water Furnace

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

WaterFurnace's Geothermal system for home heating, air-conditioning and heating water is ranked first for energy efficiency and long-term savings.

Overall operating costs of most conventional home heating, air-conditioning and water-heating systems are based on the efficiency of three systems – a fossil fuel furnace, central air conditioner and a water heater. With the Geothermal system, all operations are handled by a single system, ensuring that efficiency and savings are achieved in all areas.

Geothermal home heating and cooling systems have a higher installation cost than conventional systems because they require an earth loop, a pipe to be buried in the earth or to be submerged in a lake or pond.

Although the installation price for the Geothermal system varies, the minimum is $15,000, says Grant Blackmore, president of Eden Energy Equipment (1-800-665-3336, www.waterfurnace.ca), the Ontario distributor for WaterFurnace.

Blackmore says cost depends on the type of equipment selected – WaterFurnace manufactures several models of furnaces, air conditioners and hot-water heaters – and how easy it is to install the pipe. One can choose to purchase a hot-water heater only, which would reduce the cost considerably.

The Geothermal system delivers three or four units of energy to the home for every unit of electrical energy used. And the system works with nature, not against it, helping to minimize acid rain, air pollution and the greenhouse effect.

A new home buyer can tie the initial cost of the system into his or her monthly mortgage payment with monthly savings from the system, easily covering the additional amount added to the mortgage.

WaterFurnace guarantees its products for a minimum of five years, with a 10-year warranty on high-end products. Warranties cover all unit parts and any accessories included as part of the system.

Along with the WaterFurnace line, Eden Equipment offers products that rid a house of stale air and ensure a continuous flow of clean fresh air. They include the residential vanEE Air Exchanger and the vanEE HEPA filter & HEPA Air Exchanger (www.vanee.ca).

Merry Maids
make your home sparkle

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Merry Maids is the world's largest maid service, with more than 900 locations in the United States, and 46 in Canada.

In Toronto, it (416-489-7447) celebrates its fifth anniversary this August.

Merry Maids cleans everything from bachelor apartments to mansions.

"Each home is priced individually based on the client's needs and requirements," says David Henderson, owner of the Toronto franchise of Merry Maids.

Henderson has a 25-year background in retail credit and collections. A few years ago, he attended a franchise show in Toronto with the idea of changing careers. After the show, he says, he decided that Merry Maids was for him.

Henderson trains his staff himself. A new staff member spends his or her first day in the office with Henderson for an orientation session, which includes watching a cleaning-procedural video and two safety videos.

The safety videos cover such subjects as how to properly handle cleaning products, and how to move furniture safely.

Staff members are discouraged from engaging in small talk with their clients – they are told not to ask intrusive personal questions unrelated to cleaning – but they are encouraged to be polite and friendly.

They are instructed to respect their clients' privacy and never to open drawers or doors without permission.

Television sets or computers should not be unplugged, and if they find any money, even if it's only a penny, they are asked to bring it to the client's attention.

In the event that they break anything, they are asked to report it immediately as "the broken item will be gladly replaced by Merry Maids," Henderson says.

As it is a Monday to Friday service, Merry Maids has keys to the majority of homes they clean. "The keys are number-coded for security so there is no association with the address," he says. "Keys are kept in a locked safe box until the day of cleaning."

The service's staff is bonded, insured and covered by workers' compensation and all the cleaning products used by Merry Maids are environmentally friendly and unscented.

NATIONAL HOMES
You are the blueprint™

Illuminate your life with the right choice of lights

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

When God said "Let there be light," he clearly knew that good lighting is essential to making your room, house or world look fantastic.

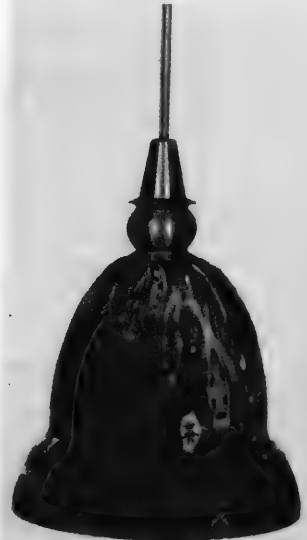
So when it comes to lighting your home from the outside, Michael Gladstone of Royal Lighting (416-782-1129) recommends installing a mixture of fixed and decorative lights and lights that are activated by motion sensors.

"If you only have motion sensors, your house will be dark all the time, so you really need a combination of both."

On the inside, there are three places where good, strong lighting is important. The bathroom needs a strong light over the mirror for shaving and applying makeup. The laundry room should be bright so you can make sure your clothes are clean. The kitchen also needs to be well-lit for preparing food, but loves of romantic dinners can install a dimmer on the light fixture over the kitchen table to set the mood.

Halogen light bulbs have become more popular in recent years because they emit a cleaner light that puts less strain on the eyes than a regular light bulb. They also have energy saving benefits. A 40-watt halogen bulb uses the same amount of energy and shines the same amount of light as a regular 60-watt light bulb.

Regular energy-efficient light bulbs such as compact fluorescents, while popular, should only be used in areas where the quality of light isn't that important, says Gladstone. He has two energy efficient light bulbs at home. He keeps one in a table lamp that stays on all day.



"When the family came over for Passover, I switched it to a tri-light – it's a nicer light – then I switched it back," he chuckles.

Tri-lights are bulbs that have different strengths. Twisting the on/off knob will increase the light from 50 watts to 100 or 150 watts.

If you've inherited Bubbe's antique lamp but the lampshade has torn and you can't bear the thought of tossing the whole thing out, Andre Sermer of Custom Lampshade (416-236-3244) has a solution. His company specializes in making hand-sewn lampshades and can recover an antique lampshade to make it look like new.

Sermer can cover lamps with parchment, craft paper or fabric. The only materials he doesn't work with are glass and mica.

"Our stuff is made like stuff was made 25 years ago," he says.

Alternatively, if you want your lampshade to match a room's colour scheme, Sermer can help you choose a fabric and colour to complement the room. He recommends that customers look for lamps at regular lighting stores and consider having a custom lampshade made.

The only thing that Sermer insists on is seeing the lamp before he agrees to make a cover for it.

"Buying a lampshade without a lamp is like buying a hat without your head," he says.

Selling your belongings can be hassle-free

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

When you're downsizing from a four-bedroom home, you probably cannot take everything with you.

Some people have contents sales to rid themselves of the belongings they longer need, and to make a little money from items that they may have acquired for high prices years ago.

Those who would rather avoid the hassle of selling their furniture, paintings, silver and knickknacks can hire professionals such as Contents Connection (905-881-6666, www.contentsconnection.com) to do the job.

> The owner receives 60% and the store takes a 40% share

Stuart Teperman of Contents Connection says he finds many people, especially the elderly, have security concerns about running their own contents sales because they are worried about their homes being overrun by strangers.

Contents Connection will hold one- or two-day contents sales if the quantity of merchandise justifies it. If there isn't enough merchandise for a contents sale, Teperman can display middle to upper-quality pieces in his 5,000-square-foot showroom in Thornhill.

The showroom features antique and good quality dining-room sets, living-room sets, bedroom sets, china, silver, lamps and light fixtures, as well as art and gift items such as picture frames – everything except appliances and clothing.

When Contents Connection sells an item that is on consignment – the price of everything in the showroom is negotiable – the owner receives 60 per cent and the store takes a 40 per cent share. As far as setting prices go, Teperman says "we know in today's market what quality used merchandise is worth." Contents Connection also operates an appraisal service.

Teperman and his wife Wendy founded Contents Connection 15 years ago. He has a background in demolition, and building owners sometimes asked him to dispose of a building's contents before the building was torn down. As a former real estate agent, Wendy Teperman watched many people move from large homes into condominiums.

The Tepermans saw a niche in the market – they realized that people have to sell their furniture when they downsize – and they went into business to help people do that. "We're a very much needed service," Teperman says.

At first the Tepermans ran contents sales only. They found, however, that they still had valuable merchandise left at the end of a one- or two-day sale so they opened a showroom to display the better quality merchandise. Their customers include interior designers who are shopping for their clients and movie people looking for props for sets.

Along with customers who are downsizing, Teperman says he also has young customers who inherit estates that they must sell. "Most of them already have dining-room sets and bedroom sets. We're a resource for them."

With the popularity of television shows about antiques and home décor, Teperman says he finds his customers are looking "beyond a piece" and using items creatively for a function that they were never intended. An antique sideboard, for instance, can become a unique bathroom counter; or an antique wine rack might be used as a towel rack.

Better to buy quality, appliance store owners advise

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

An energy-efficient kitchen saves money

Some new homeowners make kitchen appliances a back-burner priority, but with these products, you get what you pay for.

"Some people realize they hate a noisy dishwasher, so they buy the best one that is silent," says Robert Caplan, general manager of Caplan's (416-767-1655). His store focuses on high-end products that "will last decades. So people are spending more."

As appliances have become more technologically advanced, they have also become more user-friendly, Caplan says. But deciphering new features can be difficult, so he recommends researching the intended market.

Jerry Cayne, founder and owner of Cayne's (905-764-1188), says brand names are of higher quality than no-names. "If you spent $30,000 on designing your kitchen, you don't want a $20 coffee maker," he says, adding that a low-cost coffee maker might not maintain a high temperature or last as long.

Popular brands in most appliance stores include Cuisinart, Kitchen Aid, Delonghi and Braun.

In the realm of small appliances, Ariel Benaich of Living² Inc. (416-256-9234) says items such as a $400 Dualit four-slot toaster soar to another level: it uses a timer to toast, while other toasters reach the maximum heating level of their internal coils and fail to toast evenly each time.

Benaich advises customers to examine the issue of counter space. Caplan goes a step further and asks customers to realize some appliances are bigger than they used to be. Most people don't think about tiny stairwells until after they have bought a large unit, Caplan says.

So what is trendy these days? Caplan and Cayne extol stainless steel as both stylish and popular, while Benaich attacks stainless for being "too stark in a kitchen."

At Living² Inc., retro-style toasters, blenders and cordless kettles are hot sellers, with colours such as mint green and red bringing pizzazz into the cooking area.

"Cordless kettles are in, especially because of their auto shut-off feature," Benaich adds.

Caplan points out another emerging trend, this one with an environmental twist: popular items at his store include Energy Star-certified appliances because there is no PST on these products (until July 31). Energy Star is a U.S.-backed initiative whose designated products are deemed energy-efficient and environmentally friendly. A front-load washer, for example, uses less water and electricity than a top-load one, Caplan says. He estimates half his appliances are energy-efficient.

Modern appliances are user friendly

From the cooking perspective, "people still want to be their own chefs," Caplan says. Gas ranges are selling fast at his store, due to the power gas offers over electric units, he says. As well, Caplan's has live cooking demonstrations to test-drive appliances and to offer customers a fresh snack.

Whenever the appliance-shopping itch strikes, these owners advise thoroughly knowing your needs.

"If you want a blender that crushes ice, ask for that," Cayne says. "Some toaster ovens don't have a toast feature, so you either have to ask a salesman about the details or check the product box for specs."

The Net is also a useful research tool. "Go online and become an educated customer when you approach salesmen," Caplan suggests.

So we know what's fashionable in this market, but what's not so hot these days?

"At my store, food processors are out," Benaich says. "People aren't preparing large spreads anymore, especially with places... available for the basics."

As far as colours go, Caplan notices that black and almond are slow sellers.

Cayne criticizes appliances that are barely durable. "Some big box retail outlets sell you products built to sell, not built to last," he says. "Remember that."

A landscaped yard
– the perfect extension to any home

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Blake Asner, a co-owner of New Life Landscaping (416-736-7728) has seen many changes since he began working at the company some 20 years ago.

His involvement in New Life Landscaping, which is based in Downsview, started as a summer job when he was a university student. At the time, the company did commercial landscaping for plazas and large estate homes, as well as grass cutting and snow removal services. Residential landscaping was a small component of the business, he recalls.

While the company still does its commercial work as well as grass cutting and snow removal, Asner says he has seen a boom in the residential landscaping business in the last 10 years, especially in the last five to seven.

Prior to this time, he says, most residential landscaping contracts typically concerned laying sod and planting grass, as well as setting interlocking brick and paving driveways.

Residential landscaping has also expanded to encompass more features, Asner adds. "Landscaping is more sophisticated – the backyard is like an extension of the house."

He notes that New Life does a lot of custom work like irrigation, masonry, concrete, natural stone, interlocking brick, tennis and basketball courts, pool installation, children's play areas, lighting and water features such as fountains, rivers, waterfalls and ponds.

When New Life does a proposal, the design is tailored to the landscaping budget and space, he explains.

"People are more conscious of their home's outdoor image. We have a university-trained landscape architect. He's a very creative guy and his designs are brilliant. We discuss the homeowner's needs. We look at the property and design a couple of proposals for the homeowner to look at.

"Typically we specialize in pool landscaping. We do the design, the installation and landscaping. We do everything from irrigation to lighting, walkways, porches and decks.

"We try to make everything work in unison – It's better if one person does everything because everything is interrelated."

Asner notes that New Life had been incorporating ponds into some of the designs, but with concerns about the West Nile virus in recent years, ponds are less popular. "People are holding off because the water is non-circulating. When water is running, you don't have to worry about West Nile."

One of the big changes Asner has seen has been homeowners' shift to choosing more perennials and low maintenance ground cover, he says. "Perennials have a naturalized look if it's done properly."

He notes that perennials were not as plentiful 20 years ago as they are today; nurseries sold annuals, tree and shrubs. "Garden centres didn't have a wide of variety of perennials. Now there's a huge variety."

Higher-end landscaping may include such features as a gazebo, an outdoor structure typically made out of cedar, or a tennis court.

Irrigation systems and underground automated sprinkler systems, are both popular and practical says, Asner. "If you have expensive shrubbery or annuals, you don't have to worry about watering them and it saves on time."

As for patios, walkways and driveways, Asner says there are many options in material made from natural stone such as limestone and locally quarried material. "Flagstone is a general term. It can be chosen to match the facing of the house."

He adds that flagstone can be laid in a poured concrete foundation. Most people choose interlocking brick over flagstone because flagstone is more expensive.

He says interlocking brick is available in many styles. "The stumbled material is very popular. They started using larger pavers and more variation in patterns and design, but it's still a concrete brick."

Although there is still a demand for wooden decks, they are usually made from cedar or pressure-treated lumber.

There are other landscaping details that can add interest to a garden or backyard, he says. For example, a trellis is an overhead structure that can give shade. It usually covers a deck or a seating area and can be added. In fact, he says, people with patios adjacent to their houses are adding trellises which can then be converted to succahs.

Interlocking brick available in many styles

Arbours, usually made out of wood, are often used as entrance-ways, he adds.

New Life can also incorporate a play area into the landscape design, he says. Sometimes they are enclosed and fall surfaces like pea gravel, a soft material for children to play on are used.

Enjoy your backyard all summer

Retirement options?

Choose comfort, quality, service

A retirement living decision can be difficult. There are many options and it is important to find something that fits you and your lifestyle. Remember, not all retirement properties are created equal. Some people think that they may lose their independence or that they are just not ready yet.

However, Hazelton Place Retirement Residence, a unique home located on Avenue Road just north of Bloor, embodies a new approach to retirement living. "Our focus is on the individual and making sure that each person's needs are met every day," explains general manager Nadia Rahman. "Hazelton Place is truly a place to call home."

Physically, Hazelton Place certainly has all the comforts and warmth of a well-appointed, stylish home complete with a beautiful private garden and patio. Its real value, however, goes well beyond these elements.

"It's run like a first-class, small hotel" remarks Mrs. Suzanne Kergin, who moved to Hazelton Place close to two years ago. "You can live exactly as you've always lived. If you are going to live in a retirement home, you can't do better. We all agree on that."

"It's the individual attention we get and all the services which makes the difference," explains Mr. Sam Lipson, a three-year resident, who describes Hazelton Place as "a good place in every sense of the word."

Hazelton Place is managed by Diversicare Inc., one of Canada most respected management companies with a reputation for delivering the highest service standards possible.

Cuisine

What do you feel like today?

One of the toughest adjustments to retirement living can be the food. Meals often lack flavour, choices are limited, and it's simply not what you would serve at home.

At Hazelton Place it is recognized that meals are one of life's pleasures and healthy enjoyment of food is key to continued vitality. The Hazelton Place approach is simple — fresh foods, expertly prepared and beautifully presented in a comfortable setting. The focus is on stylish, quality, comfort foods, with plenty of options.

The results are delicious. Hazelton Place has earned a unequalled reputation for the high quality of its meals, offering a variety of menu choices. "The meals are absolutely superb. The soups are out of this world and rolls are served right of the oven," explains Mrs. Suzanne Kergin.

The focus is on stylish, quality, comfort foods, with plenty of options.

"I would describe the food as wholesome, healthy and interesting. It's certainly a full spectrum away from institutional," comments Dr. Julian Melzack, son of resident Rose Melzack.

Taking the culinary experience to the next level involves an ongoing attention to individual needs. The chef is more than pleased to prepare specialty favourites, sometimes using a resident's own recipe. Traditional favourites such beef brisket, potato kugel, chicken soup with matzo balls are featured, during the holidays.

Recreation

Enjoy Life. Live it now

Retirement Living is not about giving up the things you enjoy, it's about finding more. "My goal is to find ways for our residents to do the things they have always done – be it playing bridge, knitting, cooking, exercising or going to the theatre," explains Olga Stilos, manager of recreation services at Hazelton Place.

"There is no regimentation here. Everything is up to you. There is plenty to do, when you want to do it. You can live your life as you choose," says Mrs. Suzanne Kergin, a Hazelton Place resident for close to two years.

Mr. Sam Lipson is another resident who praises his experience at Hazelton Place. "I've had a great life, and am still living that life" explains Mr. Lipson, a long-time Torontonian who moved into Hazelton Place three years ago.

What's the Hazelton Place difference? "It's a matter of getting to know our residents and what they want. We talk, share ideas and come together," explains Ms. Stilos. "All our activities area focussed on the individual resident and what they want, often celebrating their traditions."

One example which Ms. Stilos likes to share is a comment a resident made after a group had gathered before Hanukkah to make latkes in our special resident gourmet kitchen area. "She said that being able to make the latkes with her friends took her back twenty years, making her feel twenty years younger," says Ms. Stilos. "It's very rewarding to be able to work with these wonderful people and help them stay active and continue the traditions which give them comfort," she adds.

Family

Relax, it's being taken care of

When Sam Lipson's daughter first came for a tour of Hazelton Place three years ago she had one word to describe it – "Wow!" Mr. Lipson moved in shortly after, settled in and now remarks that "this is home for me."

Hazelton Place is welcoming to family and friends.

Most importantly, the personalized approach at Hazelton Place, gives family members peace of mind. "The experience has been incredible for my parents and incredible for me as well," explains Dr. Julian Melzack, who lives in the U.K. and comes to visit his mother, Rose, several times a year. Rose Melzack and her late husband, Louis, moved in four years ago and were one of the first residents.

"This is a long way away from where I live, but it doesn't matter – I'm involved in my mother's care. The staff here does an excellent job of keeping in touch with me, and with my mother's physician. They readily establish a rapport," says Dr. Melzack. "There is nothing like this anywhere. It is fantastic value."

Hazelton Place is welcoming to family. Residents enjoy entertaining family and friends, both in the dining room or by arranging special functions in private rooms or lounges. Out-of-town visitors take advantage of furnished guest suites for overnight stays.

Medical

Care just for you, when you need it

Providing ongoing medical support and personal care to seniors can be challenging, and yet it is so important. Here again, Hazelton Place, provides a level of service which is a notch above.

"We make sure that every new resident has a personal care plan. We look at needs and then develop a program just for that person," explains Mr. Ron Khan, resident care manager at Hazelton Place. While many residents require no special care, others take advantage of specialized assistance services which are available as needed.

For example, an affiliated pharmacy does a quarterly medication review on every resident. This report is then given to the resident's doctor for review and discussion. Hazelton Place has its own physician who makes regular visits, or residents can continue with their own doctor.

Convenience of medical and other services is key.

Convenience of medical and other services is key. On site physiotherapy and chiropody clinics allow residents the freedom to seek treatment independently.

"Essentially, the Hazelton Place difference is a more personalized approach along with quick response and convenience," explains Mr. Khan.

Trendy furniture is bright and bold

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Buying furniture can be overwhelming; there is so much to choose from in the stores.

"When anyone is tackling a furnishing project, [I suggest] concentrating on one area at a time," says Valerie Simone of Martin Daniel Interiors (416-667-0080, www.martindanielinteriors.com). Simone is the store's co-ordinator, and is responsible for sales.

"By focusing on one room at a time, you can focus on what's best for that space," she says, "and once that's done, move on the next room and focus on that space."

Furniture is a very personal thing and should reflect the personalities and lifestyle of a home's residents, she says.

Martin Daniel specializes in Italian furniture and accessories. Italy, Simone says, has always been a leader in the furniture industry, both in terms of design and in the quality of materials used.

Currently, Italian furniture design is moving in the direction of exotic wood and shiny lacquer surfaces, while still maintaining clean and smooth lines.

Many of the furniture lines and accessories the store carries are exclusive to Martin Daniel, and include elegant furnishings in contemporary and classic styles for living rooms, bedrooms and dining rooms.

Martin Daniel's Arte Murano Boutique showcases a collection of beautiful glass from the oldest European glass-making tradition. The most renowned glass art in the world, Murano glass is highly collectible. Included in Martin Daniel's collection are one-of-a-kind sculptures, vases, Venetian mirrors and chandeliers.

The store's sales staff provide advice on space planning, and shoppers can consult with the resident interior designer if they wish. "Our interior designer will visit a home in order to create the look of the room the customer needs, once the customer is [fairly certain] that he or she wishes to furnish an entire room from Martin Daniel" Simone says.

A family business, Martin Daniel Interiors celebrates its 18th anniversary this month.

Valerie Simone's father Angelo, and her mother Ginette, are the primary buyers for Martin Daniel. Ginette is responsible for the eye-catching furniture displays in the store.

Valerie Simone, 27, and her younger brother, Martin, 25, who takes care of sales and customer service, were both raised in the family business and in the furniture industry.

Buy your furniture one room at a time

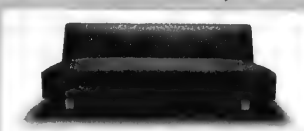
She studied marketing and finance at university and worked outside of the retail industry to get some business experience before joining Martin Daniel.

"It's definitely a decision my brother and I made on our own and it's something we're very happy with," she says.

Moving into a bigger home sends many of us out on the quest for new furniture as does downsizing, since furniture from the old home may no longer fit well into new, tighter quarters.



To avoid making costly mistakes when furnishing a larger home, Dahlia Shalit, director of merchandising for DeBoer's Furniture (416-226-3730, North York location; www.deboers.com), suggests hiring a designer. Like Martin Daniel Interiors, DeBoer's offers design services.

"Before meeting a designer, go through home-fashion magazines to determine your likes and dislikes," Shalit says. "Have a game plan, short-term or long-term. Always start with rooms you use the most, such as the family room or the bedroom. Think function first and then aesthetics."

For those who are downsizing to a condo, Shalit suggests buying pieces that have a double or triple function. An ottoman, she says, can be used as a foot rest, a coffee table or extra seating. A sofa table that divides the living and dining areas can also be used as a serving surface.

She says continuous colour throughout the condo will create a feeling of spaciousness. "Choose pieces that you are in love with and never be afraid to ask a designer for help. It will pay off."

The trend toward neutral colors in furnishings – even though neutrals are still strong – has been giving way to bold, bright colours. Sofas, accessories, throws and pillows are vibrant with clear bright colours such as red, reds on purple, orange, greens, yellows and hot pinks. "We are rediscovering colour," Shalit says.

DeBoer's offers its customers five different looks, ranging from bold modern to traditional, as the young generation wants to create its own look, Shalit says. "They don't want to be the same as their friends."

DeBoer's was founded 54 years ago by the late Anne DeBoer, a Dutch immigrant who opened his first furniture store in the early 1950s. DeBoer's motto was "good design and craftsmanship at affordable prices."

Currently, there are six DeBoer's locations – five in Toronto including DeBoer's Studio (416-630-5369) a high-end furniture gallery, and one store in Ottawa. John, Anne DeBoer's son, works for DeBoer's, as does John's daughter, Suanne DeBoer, the company's general manager.

Company helps with home maintenance tasks

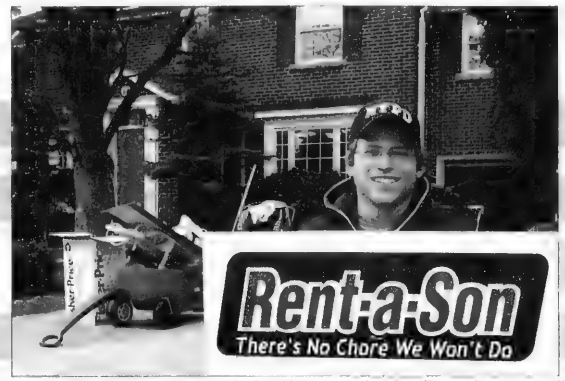
By ZACK MEDICOFF
Special to The CJN

For some Torontonians, this season simply means moving – packing, disassembling furniture, loading and unloading boxes. It can quickly cause a headache.

Enter Dustin Kroft, 24, an entrepreneur who decided to help clean up messy nightmares. His Toronto-based company, Rent-a-Son, provides solutions for home maintenance tasks that always seem to get put off.

The idea grew from his days as a student at University of Western Ontario. Some of his friends completed a gardening job and they decided to start their own company when they returned to Toronto. That's also when Kroft watched an episode of The Oprah Winfrey Show where she profiled a service called Rent a Husband.

The company was a group of men who did odd jobs for single and working mothers, many of whom didn't have the time or expertise to complete the tasks involved.



The company was a success, and "after watching the show, I knew the idea would work in Toronto," Kroft says. "But I wanted to provide more services than what the guys on the program did.

"We deal a lot with single parents, dual income families and seniors. We started by advertising in community newspapers, word of mouth and placing door to door flyers. But we pride ourselves on being young, energetic, friendly workers who make sure people are comfortable in their own homes."

His "sons" are college or university students who handle tough work in the garden, trash removal or jobs inside the apartment or home. The best, he says, is that they'll complete all the jobs in one visit so that you don't have to hire multiple companies on different schedules.

"Why do you have to deal with so many people? It just ends up as timely and costly. We're willing to do anything from car washing to interior area cleaning and we'll do it all in one shot. It's a much better deal."

Kroft says much of the work they do at this time of year is power washing decks, driveways and patios. They also remove pesky mould and mildew that grow on rocks and other hard to reach places.

For now, Kroft is focusing on his hometown market but hopes to take the idea to other cities soon. He also says that no other company in Toronto offers customized garage cleaning. They'll throw out the items you don't want and organize the items you do.

"We can even undercut the trash removal companies because it's not our primary source of income. We're one-stop, home service shopping."

Spring is one of the busiest times for Rent-a-Son, Kroft says, as many homeowners look outside at the after-effects of winter. To prolong the longevity of the home, he recommends that you keep up decks, lawns and yards after Canada's harsh winter season.

"We charge really affordable rates that are by the hour, no matter what service you choose. We'll do anything, well, almost anything. We did get a call to make a full outdoor hockey ring and I had to decline. But we did ref a hockey game at a birthday party," he says and then laughs.

"We've moved patio furniture from Toronto to cottage country. We get very random requests and we fulfil most of them. That's what makes us different."

Downsizing tips

help make the most of your condo

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

Downsizing your home or moving into your first condominium does not mean you have to downsize your style or live in a tiny box of a dwelling. There are ways to make a small living space seem much larger than it really is.

You can't take your entire house with you to a condominium, so before you move, consider how much space you have for furniture. Most condos don't have room for a large dining room table or several sofas.

"You can't put a dining room table into a 1,000-square-foot place," says Brian Murphy of Brian Murphy Designs (416-293-4917). But if there is a piece of furniture that you can't bear to part with, consider giving it to your children, Murphy suggests.

Consider space before moving your furniture

If you're moving into your first small condo, avoid buying a queen-size bed, because it will dominate a room. Instead, consider a bed that pulls out of the wall, because it leaves the floor open during the day.

"At night, push the chair out of the way and pull down the bed," says Murphy. Check out Ikea or Home Depot for melamine wall units, or if you're really short of cash, you can make your own shelves.

Toss the clutter, he says. "If you try and put everything in [a small space], it'll look small," Murphy warns.

A cleaner home is a bigger home

Instead, live by the old adage that less is more. If you haven't used it in six months, it's probably time to toss it. Be merciless with tchatchkes. Remember, a cleaner place is a bigger place, he says.

Sometimes old furniture just doesn't work with your new space. But don't feel you have to throw everything out and start from scratch, says Diane Bosworth of DB Interior Innovations (905-303-5773). Instead, you may want to accent one of your current pieces with a new one. "Sometimes moving involves buying some new pieces," she says.

Some furniture stores carry items in small sizes that are perfect for condo living. Check out consignment shops and estate sales. Bosworth recommends the consignment stop Of Things Past (185 Bridgeland Ave.).

Because every inch of space matters in a condo, consider investing in a wall unit, she says. The few inches of floor space you lose to the wall unit will be made up in storage space. Some wall units can hold a TV, a desk and a bookshelf in one place. Shelves and wall units eliminate clutter and keep a room looking tidy, and a tidy room always looks bigger.

New designs with glass and mirrors can make small spaces look bigger than they are, says Bosworth. Consider installing a mirror across from a window to create an illusion of space. Using indirect lighting will also make a room look larger.

Gone are the days of separate rooms for the office, bedroom and dining room. If you're living in a tight space, everything should be in one large room. She also recommends a wall unit. During the day, it's an office and living room, she says.

Although condos are small, designers use a variety of techniques to make the space seem larger than it is, such as nine-foot ceilings and floor-to-ceiling windows and mirrors, Bosworth says. Using glass as an accent instead of wood will also make a small space feel bigger, because it lets the light pass through.

Certain types of furniture can achieve a similar optical effect. Slipper chairs and couches without arms are popular with condo-dwellers, because they are modern and make the space look less cluttered. Bosworth has also seen ottomans that double as tables or chairs.

Using whites or off-white paint colours can also make a space feel larger and cleaner, but if you love colours, don't shy away from them.

Some light colours can make a room feel larger. Bosworth says subtle earth tones look good for most rooms. But before you paint your walls, it's important to consider the lighting in a room, as some colours work best with certain lights.

Also, consider investing in a closet organizer for bedroom closets. Marty Katz from Shelf Help (416-291-7008) says that if a closet is organized properly, you should be able to find exactly what you want in seconds. The same holds true for kitchen cabinets, pantries and shelves.

How to make your own shelves

Buy several 2 x 12-inch pieces of plain wood, angle brackets and paint from Home Depot. Sand and paint the wood. Fasten the wood to the wall using the angle brackets.

"You don't even need a saw. Twenty bucks," says Murphy. "It won't be gorgeous, but it'll work to hold stuff."

If they're really ugly, you can cover the shelves with a curtain. Attach a rod to the ceiling in front of the shelves. Fasten a large piece of fabric to the rod and drape it in front of the shelves.

New condos offer luxury and great location

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Two dream communities, Thornhill City Centre and Viva Condominiums, are currently taking shape in the Greater Toronto Area.

The ground has been broken for the first two of the three gleaming, high-rise condo towers of Thornhill City Centre, located just northwest of Bathurst and Centre streets.

Farther south on Bathurst Street north of Wilson Avenue, Viva Condominiums, a trio of elegant mid-rise buildings will soon be completed.

When the first building of Liberty Development's Thornhill City Centre was released, "people were sleeping in their cars for two nights waiting for the sales office to open," says Lori Nusbaum, Liberty's sales and marketing manager.

Thornhill City Centre is one of the fastest-selling condo communities in the GTA. The first building sold out so quickly that many people had to wait until the second building was released before they could buy a suite.

Selected units are still available in the second building, but some design options are gone. The third building has a small selection of each design option in one, two, or three-bedroom units.

Prices are in the $150,000 to $400,000 range, with a large selection under $200,000 still available. Occupancy of the first phase of the centre is set for the spring or summer of 2005.

Nusbaum says Thornhill City Centre has created excitement because nothing like it exists in the neighbourhood.

A beautiful, fully furnished three-bedroom model suite can be viewed at Thornhill City Centre's sales office (www.thornhillcitycentre.ca, 905-731-8302) on Bathurst Street, one block north of Centre.

The open-style living and dining rooms of the centre's suites create a spacious environment, and the big windows in the living and dining rooms allow for an abundance of natural light.

The European-inspired kitchens of Thornhill City Centre, each equipped with a refrigerator, an oven and a dishwasher, include a breakfast bar and granite countertops.

The master bedrooms in the centre feature walk-in closets and ensuites. Inviting soaker tubs are an attraction of some of the bathrooms, while others come with large walk-in shower stalls. Most of the centre's suites feature a balcony or terrace from which to enjoy the lovely landscaped surroundings. As well, each unit includes an in-suite laundry and an in-suite alarm system. Access throughout the building is controlled by security cards.

A concierge posted on the grounds of Thornhill City Centre 24-hours-a-day will not only control access and monitor security but will also provide services such as receiving deliveries and ordering taxis.

Condos a welcome lifestyle change

The centre's Club Liberty offers a well-equipped exercise room, a luxurious in-door pool, a whirlpool and a sauna, with no membership fees.

The centre's facilities include a games room and a party room with a fully equipped kitchen and a wet bar. And an elegant guest suite is available for out-of-town visitors.

Thornhill City Centre is located across from the Promenade Mall, near shops, restaurants, grocery stores, parks, recreational facilities and schools.

Highways 7 and 407 are close to the centre, and the area is well serviced by public transit. The proposed York Region Rapid Transit will offer another transportation option in the future.

Liberty Development has been in the business of construction and development for more than 30 years. It is the creator of several condominium communities, including Richmond Hill's Bristol Court, Toronto's The West Village, Thornhill's Liberty Suites and Liberty Towers I and II, and North York's Villa Hermosa Townhomes. Liberty's commercial properties include Richmond Hill's Times Square and Thornhill's Commerce Gate.

Those interested in living a little farther south should consider Viva Condominiums (www.vivacondos.ca, 416-398-1337) which offers urban elegance at Bathurst and Wilson.

When it is completed, Viva Condominiums will be a trio of mid-rise buildings that will bring new life to the west side of Bathurst Street, between Charleswood Drive and Allingham Gardens, just north of Wilson Avenue.

The site of Viva Condominiums was once home to a string of post-war eight-plexes. The Brown Group of Companies and The Remington Group, the developers of Viva, have roots in the Bathurst-Wilson community dating back to the late 1940s and 50s, and long pondered the future of the area.

The result is Viva Condominiums, a trio of glass and pre-cast concrete mid-rises, which will be strung like urban jewels along an 800-foot stretch of Bathurst Street. The Viva community includes a six-storey building with 82 rental units and a pair of eight-storey structures with 219 condominium homes.

"What we wanted to do was create continuity within the community," says Richard Tripodi, vice-president of The Remington Group's high-rise division. "We wanted to preserve the rental option while adding affordable condos. That would allow first-time buyers to stay in an area they love, and empty nesters to downsize in the heart of a community which has been their home for decades."

Recently, the aging eight-plexes at Bathurst and Wilson were demolished to make way for the first of the Viva buildings, which is scheduled to open for occupancy in the summer of 2005. More than 75 per cent of the units in the first building have been sold, reports Jay Brown, general manager of The Brown Group, and he says that some of the suite designs in the building are sold out.

One-bedroom units at Viva Condominiums start at $159,900, two-bedrooms at $207,900 and three-bedroom penthouses at $338,900. The second condo building has been redesigned with some smaller units added to the mix, as well as some extra-large penthouse suites of up to 1,630 square feet. Each Viva suite features a balcony or a terrace, along with a parking spot in the underground garage and a storage locker.

> A concierge, backed by a security-card entrance, will be posted around the clock at the reception desk

Extras such as five free appliances, imported ceramic tiles, custom-designed kitchen cabinets and 40-ounce broadloom carpeting are included. And for a limited time, early buyers get three opening bonuses – laminated hardwood flooring in the living and dining rooms, three stainless-steel appliances, and a granite kitchen countertop. A model kitchen can be viewed at the Viva sales office at 4 DeQuincey Blvd.

A concierge, backed by a security-card entrance, will be posted around the clock at the reception desk of Viva Condominiums' main entrance.

Viva's health club includes an exercise gym, a change room, a steam room, a sauna, a media room and a billiards room. The party room will open onto an adjacent sun terrace and Viva's open-air gardens and landscaped promenade.

Viva Condominiums is close to stores and restaurants and a short drive or bus ride away from Yorkdale Shopping Centre. The area is well serviced by public transportation including the Bathurst Street bus, and Wilson Heights and York Mills subway stations are seconds away by car, as is Highway 401.

Jay Brown's grandfather, Sam, started The Brown Group in the early 1950s. The Remington Group was formed just after World War II by Donato Bratty. Now, his son Rudolph "Rudy" Bratty is Remington's chair and CEO, and his son Jerry is the company's chief operating officer. Both families have left an indelible mark on the GTA.

The Browns have focused on management and land development, and today their property management portfolio covers 2,200 residential units and a half million square feet of commercial space in the GTA.

Three years ago, The Brown Group created a memorable loft condo project on Sorauren Avenue and the company is the managing developer behind Tribute Communities' 2,500-home Inspiration project in Richmond Hill.

The Remington Group builds about 700 homes each year through its Remington, State Park and Broadway companies. Remington is developing Downtown Markham, 3,500 new homes in a combination of mid and high-rise condominiums in the area between Warden Avenue and Kennedy Road north of Highway 407.

Dress your dinner table elegantly

Cover photo from Entertaining on the Jewish Holidays, Modan Publishing House

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

You're planning an elegant dinner party and you want to wow your guests. You're not sure, though, how to set the table. Ditching the paper plates and plastic cutlery is definitely a no brainer, but then how do you choose the proper tableware?

For starters, you might want to turn to the experts for some advice. Linen retailer Ellis Chitiz of Deblins (416-782-2910) and Gisella Goodman of Goodman's China and Gifts Ltd. (905-731-3564), offer plenty of ideas on how to create the right mood and table setting for an elegant dinner party.

Goodman's (1136 Centre St.), the company founded by Sam and Gisella Goodman 34 years ago, continues to be a family-run business. Sam is retired, but Gisella runs the store with two of their three daughters, Rozsi Lebovich and Susan Goodman. The store moved from its original location on Wilmington to Thornhill five years ago.

Much of their merchandise – fine china, crystal and cutlery can be viewed on their Website: www.goodmanschina.com.

Gisella Goodman says that simple bone china – white with a silver band – is the ideal setting for a formal elegant dinner. Wedgewood, Mikasa, and Royal Worcester, companies that make this elegant dinnerware, are just some of the lines that are available at Goodman's.

While the white and silver design of china is recommended, she stresses that any set of dishes will do, as long as they're bone china and are part of a matching set.

Bone china is manufactured in a special way, she notes. "It starts out as porcelain, [then] they add metal bone to make it whiter and stronger. It becomes more translucent. There's nothing stronger than bone china."

There are different styles of china, says Goodman. "You can go towards a more traditional set which has more gold and more designs on it. Modern is plainer – more simple."

She says people usually choose simpler and more elegant patterns for their meat china, while the dairy dishes tend to be more colourful.

Choosing the right crystal also adds to the elegance of the dinner setting, she explains. "Crystal should have at least 24 per cent lead in it. It has to glow like diamonds when you put it on your table."

She warns people to be careful when buying crystal. "They have to watch out that the glasses are not too heavy on the bottom and thin on top. When you wash them they could break."

She says there are some beautiful lines of crystal available at Goodman's, among them, Mikasa, Royal Doulton, and Waterford, which is the top of the line, she says. As well, people can choose from a wide selection of crystal barware, including fluted champagne, liqueur, high ball and martini glasses.

According to Goodman, you can dress your table with more crystal such as crystal water goblets and wine glasses; however, you want to avoid cluttering the table. "Don't use glasses that are too tall."

Serving platters are always 14 and 16 in., she says. "If you're going to pass food along, have two serving dishes and pass them around in different directions. With vegetable bowls – unless you have room – leave it to everyone to pass them around."

Serving dishes don't necessarily have to match, she adds. "Different funky pieces can go nicely. If it doesn't match, it doesn't matter. They come and go from the table very quickly."

There are several options for cutlery. She recommends silver-plated or sterling for more formal dinners. However, high quality stainless steel sets are also acceptable and are popular because they requires less care than silver, she says.

'Before you set the table, you'll need an appropriate table cover'

Some of the better makes of cutlery carried at Goodmans include Sheffield, Robbe and Berking, Oneida, and Reed and Bartin.

Before you set the table, you'll need an appropriate table cover, says Chitiz, owner of Deblins Linens, which has three 15,000 square-foot locations in the GTA: 39 Orfus Rd. (416-782-2910); 7979 Weston Rd. just north of Highway 7 (905-264-0975); and 2575 Dundas St. W. in Mississauga (905-820-1509).

Chitiz recommends damask tablecloths for formal occasions. Damask, he explains, is a woven cloth that comes in cotton, linen or a blend of the two. White damask can actually be bleached for stain removal, he adds.

Deblins also carries a poly-cotton damask cloth in a scroll design made in Israel. It comes in white and natural and is available in a variety of sizes up to 198 inches in length.

For lower maintenance tablecloths, Chitiz suggests a stain-proof polyester that requires no ironing. He notes that Deblins' Diamond and Dot cloths, which are available exclusively under Deblins' Charlemagne brand, come in six colours – navy blue, black, mint, gold, ivory and white – and in many different sizes right up to 216 inches in length.

They wash beautifully, he says. "Just wash the cloth in cold water and dry it in a cool dryer."

Do a mitzvah with a gift of Judaica gallery owner says

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

Ayala Bar is an Israeli who has applied her skills as a jewelry artist to the creation of mezuzot that are a visual delight.

Bar's beautiful creations made of brightly coloured glass and beads set in intricate patterns are part of the extensive collection of stunning Judaica on display at A Show of Hands Petroff Gallery (1-877-542-3600, 416-782-1696, www.ashowofhands.com), which specializes in three-dimensional works.

Along with Bar's creations, the gallery's collection of mezuzot includes Yehuda Parmat's elegant glass designs, Ed Cohen's wood inlay, Emily Rosenfeld's contemporary pewter look and Brian and Alice Bergner's hand-carved Jerusalem stone. The pewter and Jerusalem stone pieces can be used outside, but the others in the collection are too fragile to be exposed to the elements, says Steven Petroff, who owns A Show of Hands with his wife, Sara Levine Petroff.

Some of the couple's collection of Judaica, such as textile artist Edna Sandler's tallit and an array of glass menorahs, seder plates, Shabbat candlesticks and challah covers, can be seen from almost anywhere one stands in the spacious gallery.

The Petroffs' website also features works by the gallery's artists. In the Judaica section of the website, one can view many pieces, among them Sara Beames' striking cobalt menorah and Quebec artist Sylvie Belanger's contemporary and colourful transparent glass menorahs.

The gallery has a large selection of kiddush cups, including one of Yehuda Parmat's colourful cups made of sandblasted glass and Kathleen Manhattan's clear cup with a touch of blue at the top of its stem. Manhattan's kiddush cup rests on top of a clear plate etched with the Star of David in a picture on the gallery's website.

Sara Levine Petroff, an artist and an interior designer, occasionally designs pieces that other artists execute. The result of one such collaboration, with Boris Kramer, is the striking simchah menorah. Kramer used blacksmithing techniques to create the steel menorah. Its branches are figures of dancers and its shamash is the bride.

Giving Judaica such as a seder plate as a gift is a mitzvah, Petroff says, because you're helping someone to celebrate a Jewish holiday.

When you're shopping for a gift, trust your instincts, he advises. "Even if you know someone's colours and what they need, you never know for sure."

A Show of Hands carries kaleidoscopes by Joanne Flatlow-Jacobs – among them one with a klezmer theme and another with the lion of Judah theme – as well as kaleidoscopes by other artists. The gallery has the largest selection of contemporary kaleidoscopes in Canada, and Petroff says they make great gifts for men.

Israeli glass artist Andreas Meyer's functional glass display pieces come in bold red, etched with thin black lines, and in more subtle creamy white glass, decorated with wispy burgundy leaves and flowers.

The white pieces are great as a wedding gift, Petroff says. "Even if you don't know someone's home very well, these will fit anywhere."

The gallery offers at-home consultations for which Sara Levine Petroff brings pieces to people's homes and makes suggestions to beautify their home.

"She makes sure pieces tie together in a room," Petroff says.

Sara does the in-gallery displays and buys the art, while Petroff takes care of the business side.

Matching napkins and tablecloth complete the look

Cotton should never be put in a hot dryer, he says, because it can shrink and it creases more.

Chitiz notes that Deblins has extra-large banquet-sized tablecloths. "We now carry cloths 216 inches long. You won't find that size anywhere else in the city on the shelves except at Deblins. It's very well priced."

The Diamond and Dots comes in a 70-in. width. He says this size is wider than most other standard tablecloths, which are usually in the 60-in. range.

Chitiz stresses the importance of using matching cloth napkins for an elegant dinner. "Don't use paper napkins. If you're serving beautiful food, and you're using beautiful china and a beautiful table cloth, why kill the whole mood with paper napkins. Buy the matching or co-ordinating napkins and finish it off beautifully with a napkin ring."

He says Deblins' napkin rings come in wood, acrylic and metal. "Metal is more formal and traditional. Wood and acrylic are more contemporary. You can dress up or dress down a table with napkin rings. They're the smallest items, but they're immediately visible and they add a nice finishing touch."

Chitiz says ideally, a tablecloth should have an overhang of 10-15 in., but it can be as short as a seven- to 12 in. "If your table is between sizes always go for a longer than shorter tablecloth. However, if it's more than a 15 in. overhang you have the wrong size.

"The only exception is with a round table. Some people like to drape the tablecloth to the floor. At Deblins, we carry a 90-in. round cloth. It's almost impossible to find that size at a department store."

There are lots of knowledgeable people on hand to help out at the store if people have questions, says Chitiz. "I say, 'You worry about the food. Leave the table linens to us.' "

Decorate your home with Judaica

This fall, a dozen artists who create Judaica for A Show of Hands will be involved with a fundraising project for an, as yet unnamed Jewish day school. Part of the purchase price of each work of art will be contributed to the school.

Eventually two or three schools will be involved in the program, Petroff says. "We know how important Jewish day schools are."

Another Toronto gallery that carries a wealth of Judaica is Heritage Fine Art (416-260-0398).

It has one of the largest collections of Jewish-themed art and Judaica from around the world, including European paintings from the 17th, 18th and 19th centuries, as well as modern works from around the world.

The gallery is owned and operated by Igor Kuchinsky, 96, and his wife, Tatiana, 83. Both are Holocaust survivors from Poland, where Kuchinsky, who holds a PhD in musicology, was a concert pianist and his wife was a ballet dancer. They made their way to Canada in 1948, settling in Montreal.

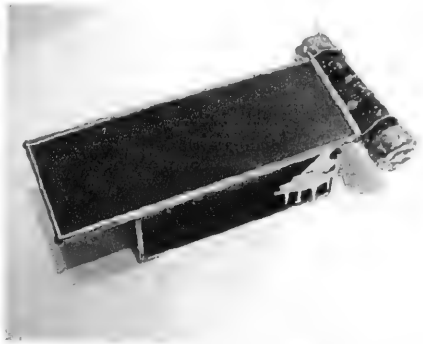
Kuchinsky became the cultural program director for the Canadian Jewish Congress, a position he held from the mid-1950s to the late '60s, says Kuchinsky's son, Bob.

As the commissioner of Expo '67's Pavilion of Judaism, Kuchinsky was introduced to Jewish art and Jewish artists from around the world. Once Expo ended, he continued to mount exhibitions at the pavilion.

"He was continually involved in world-class art and exhibitions from around the world," his son says.

Tataina Kuchinsky ran a ballet school in Montreal for a time and in the late '40s went back to school, where she earned a master of social work degree.

In the early 1970s, Kuchinsky and his wife moved to Toronto. Kuchinsky opened Galerie Heritage on Yorkville Avenue, which he operated for 25 years. Tataina became director of the Wagman Centre of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, a position she held for 25 years.



In the late '80s, Tatiana Kuchinksy retired from Baycrest. She opened an antique business at the Harbourfront Antique market. Kuchinsky closed his Yorkville gallery and amalgamated his business with his wife's.

The Harbourfront Antique Market closed a year ago and the market's high-end dealers, including the Kuchinskys, have relocated to the Toronto Antique Centre on King Street West, near the Royal Alexandra Theatre.

"Even at their advanced age, they're down there every day," Bob Kuchinsky says. "Mixed in with the vendors, you have two spry senior citizens running one of the largest operations in there."

Kuchinsky advises people to buy art or antiques that they love. The first impact of art is emotional, he says, unlike a refrigerator or a television set. "It's a combination of investment and emotional attachment. It increases in value as it adds pleasure to your life."

Kuchinsky says that some customers send their decorators to his parents' gallery to select paintings and antiques for them.

After more than 30 years of accumulating antiques and art, his parents' collection is phenomenal, he says. "It's an eclectic collection, from 17th century Dutch paintings to modern Russian works."

Bedrooms need comfort and warmth

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

If you are looking to redecorate a bedroom, Miriam Mueller of Designer Treasures Interiors (905-764-3737) has some suggestions.

One of the first things she considers when redecorating a bedroom is the mood that the room's owner wants to achieve. For the most part, people want their rooms to be relaxing spaces, she says.

"Think about what you want to feel in a bedroom. It's such an intimate place."

Most people tend to prefer warm, soothing colours in a bedroom. "To make a room feel warm, I use butter colours, sage green, taupe, or maybe a darker colour. Don't use too much in blues because they are cold colours," she says.

To enhance the cozy atmosphere of a bedroom, Mueller suggests window shades or curtains. "Blinds with sheers and overdrapes are big now," she says. "Venetian blinds and shutters are out."

Some people like to introduce silks, sheer or print fabrics or trimmings.

Mueller recommends buying linens, rugs and drapes to match the floors, then deciding on a paint colour because it is easier to match paint to fabrics than the reverse.

When it comes to buying linens, most people are deceived by the thread count, says Freddy Faust of Revelle Home Fashions (416-703-4533). It's the yarn count that's more important. The higher the yarn count, the stronger the fabric, he says.

"If it feels nice and it's cotton then you shouldn't worry about the thread count," says Faust, who stocks fine Israeli and Italian linens.

The same holds true for duvet covers.

"Thread count is not important in a duvet. The real thing is the quality of the down inside the duvet and the processing of the down," says David Saini of David's Fine Linens (416-590-7311).

Good-quality down is resilient and bounces back up when you push it down. "If it's flat then it's not good quality," Saini cautions.

The most luxurious bed sheets are made from Egyptian cotton. "It's like a silk," says Saini. However, the price often reflects its top-notch quality. The most versatile shades for linen colours are ivory, white and earth tones, he adds.

The key to maintaining fine linens in excellent condition is to wash them in mild soap, says Saini. Brands like Sunlight and Tide are too harsh on delicate fabrics. If you throw your linens in the washing machine, do a smaller load of laundry. Fabrics absorb extra water that makes them heavy, and fine detailing on linens can get caught on rough patches inside the washing machine.

When buying linens, Faust recommends asking about the store's return policy. Sometimes the size labels on a package of linen aren't accurate, and there's no sense in being stuck with sheets a size too big or too small.

"You spend about 25 per cent of your life in bed," he says. "Don't be stingy with it."

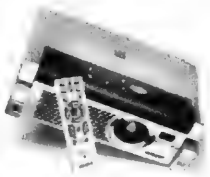
Salespeople can help customize your home entertainment system

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

There was a time when the experience of a jumbo screen and surround sound could be enjoyed only in the confines of a movie theatre.

That time, says William Freeman of Kromer Radio, has passed.



With 16-foot projectors and digital surround-sound speakers as examples of the high-tech products offered at specialty electronics stores, the motion picture theatre experience is now a popular form of home entertainment.

"It's something families do together at home," says Freeman, a custom home electronics specialist.

"And there's a better picture and better sound."

Freeman and Richard Bowden of Bay Bloor Radio agree plasma televisions and LCD technology are the hot sells these days. Another product gaining steam, although it won't hit the Canadian market full stride until July, is Apple's highly touted iPod personal digital music player.

Whatever the high-tech product is, Bowden says the first step before making a purchase is determining the purpose of the product.

"If all you want to do is watch television while you eat breakfast, you don't need a home theatre," Bowden advises. "If you want to watch really fabulous movies all the time, design the system and buy accordingly."

That's where knowledgeable salespeople come into play.

"You need a professional to explain to you the advantages of each piece," says Freeman.

"At Kromer, what you have are a lot of experienced people who have a large amount of training."

Bowden urges customers to be straightforward with salespeople about what you're seeking and how much you can afford.

"Be honest with the salesman. Say, 'If this was the dimension of your room and you have $5,000 to spend, what would you buy?'" says Bowden.

"That would be an intelligent way to do it."

Doing some research on reputable electronics companies can also come in handy. "Sony makes great televisions, but that doesn't mean they make great speakers," says Freeman, noting that certain companies specialize in particular products.

Be aware that delivery and installation of these products may not be a cinch and you may have to pay a little more for those services. But Bowden notes that basic delivery and setup, including instructions for the user, is performed by Bay Bloor Radio staff at no cost.

A colourful garden is bright addition to any home

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Traditionally, Victoria Day weekend is the official start to the planting season but eager gardeners don't have to wait until then to get going. Gardening experts Ray Sue of Sue's Fruit Market (905-731-2132) and Ben Hoffman of Fairlawn Market (416-781-8922) advise people to use the time earlier in May to clean up their gardens and prepare their flower beds.

These local flower and plant retailers note that along with cleaning the garden, early-bird gardeners can also plant pansies at this time of year. Pansies, which come in a variety of colours, are hearty annuals that can resist colder spring weather.

Both Sue's, which has three locations, and Fairlawn Market, which is located at 1704B Avenue Rd. at the corner of Fairlawn Avenue, sell a large variety of annuals, hanging baskets, and cut flowers. Fairlawn also carries a broad assortment of perennials.

The late Kong Sue opened the original Sue's at 3673 Bathurst St. just south of Wilson, (416-781-2734) in 1973, shortly after immigrating from China with his wife Yin. The store, a popular place for buying quality fruit and vegetables, cut flowers, and indoor plants, as well as floral arrangements for holidays and hanging baskets, expanded to 7241 Bathurst St. in Thornhill in 1983, with a third location opening at 205 Don Head Village in Richmond Hill (905-737-0520) in 1986.

Ray Sue, a co-owner of the stores with his four siblings, offers plenty of gardening advice. He says one of the first things to do before planting is to replenish the soil. He suggests covering the flower beds with loam, a black-coloured soil, because many gardens don't have enough soil.

He notes that different varieties of annuals need different levels of sunlight. For instance, marigolds and geraniums take full sun while impatients and begonias do best in partial shade. Annuals can wilt when the temperature rises above 30 degrees and so he stresses the importance of making sure the flowers get an adequate amount of water.

They may need watering twice a day during hot weather.

Advice for the amateur gardener

Sue recommends watering the flowers first thing in the morning, and after the sun sets during peak heat times. He warns against watering during the peak heat times because the flowers can go into shock. Otherwise, in normal warm weather, once a day watering is adequate, he says.

Sue's offers hanging baskets with a selection of annual flowers that include geraniums, impatients, New Guinea impatients, petunias and a baby petunia that "falls nicely over the edge of the basket that can take sun.

"The hanging basket is like an instant garden," he says "A lot of customers are buying these prepared flowers. They're like the colourful big baskets with everything in them."

The Fairlawn Market also carries a wide variety of annuals, hanging baskets and cut flowers. Impatients come in variety of colours, among them, pinks, hot pinks, purple, salmon and white. Other annuals include pansies, snapdragons, marigolds and ivies.

Hoffman, who co-owns the store with Paul O'Neill, says that they offer the basic gardening supplies such as peat moss, top soil, grass seed, miracle grow and other chemical fertilizers, and vegetable and herb plants. There is also a variety of common perennial flowers, clay pots, cast iron urns and urn liners with simple arrangements.

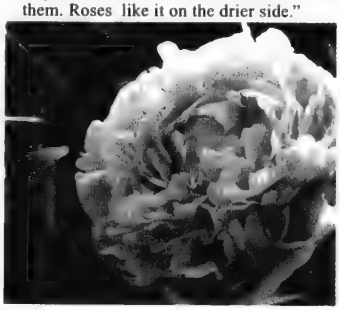
Customers can also count on solid gardening advice, says Hoffman. For example, his staff will help people come up with designs for their cast iron urns and other gardening pots. "A lot of people have them. We give them ideas on how to fill them."

He says it's important to wait until mid May to do planting because one has to know where the shady areas in the garden are, and you can't tell that until the trees are in bloom.

Annuals generally need a sunnier exposure than perennials, but certain perennials like clematis and roses need more sun, he says, noting that he carries about 15 different colours of clematis. Roses also come in a wide selection of colours. "We carry the standard hardy hybrid in lots of colours – yellow, white, pinks, oranges, reds.

The rose blooms are the size of standard cut flowers at the florists and flower markets, he adds.

"Rose bushes should be planted in the spring and do well if they are fertilized with a mound of manure," explains Hoffman. "They're sun-orientated. They also need to be protected in the winter. Don't over-water them. Roses like it on the drier side."



Other perennials requiring a lot of sunlight are poppies, which come in shades of reds and oranges. Two different sizes are available: dwarf size that serve as ground cover, or a taller variety that grows to about two feet tall, says Hoffman.

You'll find foxglove in a variety of pinks – they require partial sun – and perennials such as trilliums and lily of the valley for more shaded areas, he says.

Other perennials available at Fairlawn Market include bleeding heart, hostas, delphenians and lupins.

Hoffman says vegetables and herbs can be planted in mid- May once the nights are warm. The selection of herbs include basil, coriander, oregano, rosemary and thyme. He recommends planting vegetables such as tomatoes and zucchini, which are very easy to grow if they get enough sun.

Synergy provides multiple home services

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

In order to create a home environment that is both aesthetically pleasing and optimally functional, Synergy Home Systems (905-669-5005) installs multi-purpose state-of-the-art electronics to simplify seemingly complex equipment. The result is the ultimate in comfort and security with flawless design.

General Manager Robert Campol explains how the company concept came to be. "When I started the business I saw there was a void in the home electronics industry, where individual companies were only looking after one area of a client's needs. What ended up happening was that as systems were forced to communicate with each other, misunderstandings ensued. I decided the time was long overdue to have one company deliver multiple services successfully."

From security to home entertainment, Synergy Home Systems installs and services quality equipment that enhances home life for a discriminating clientele. They can provide the ultimate escape for any film buff, a personal sanctuary of a THX-certified home theatre away from the noise of the family room and buzz of the kitchen. This is a retreat to escape to, a sound-insulated room where one sits comfortably in a motorized recliner, while watching a 100-in. screen with a projector. The theatre is designed and built to accurately reproduce movie soundtracks, truly a treat for the senses, and all at the touch of a button.

When one wants to simply watch TV in a shared living area, home designers are thrilled with the magical mirror. This specially designed mirror cleverly conceals a plasma TV. When the TV is in use the picture is excellent, but turn the TV off and a framed mirror is all there is to see, blending in beautifully with the room décor.

A multi-room audio system is a centrally located stereo system that family members can access from any room in the house. It enables them to listen to a variety of musical media: radio, CDs, satellite music, music off the Internet, from wherever they are. As Campol adds, "it's great for large families with different musical tastes."

For those who require minimal lighting during the night hours of Shabbat, a system with a built-in clock can be designed and programmed to have the lights dim out automatically at a certain hour, and then turn off at a later hour. Lighted pathways can also create just enough light to illuminate certain routes. For instance, a family may opt to have a path of lights set up from the front door, on up the steps and bedrooms, to light the way when coming in Friday night.

Synergy Home Systems also creates exquisite home gardens, both for the indoors and out. They artfully blend technology with nature, strategically placing stereo speakers or functional lights within rocks or even waterfalls. The whole system can be easily controlled with a personal digital assistant.

To protect one's home and garden, Synergy Home Systems expertly installs innovative security systems. Cameras can be placed off the property, looking at the home from the back, perhaps from a hidden camera in a tree. Video surveillance is available for the playground, pool or anywhere in the house, very important for parents who want to check up on the safety of their children.

With safety comes peace of mind, and there is no better frame of mind in which to enjoy the comforts of your home. From telephone/intercom systems to high-speed internet wiring to serene gardens, Synergy Home Systems creates comfortable worry-free home environments in which to live, love and laugh.

One stop shopping for all your backyard needs

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Fortinos (1-800-565-9690) is quickly becoming the "destination stop" for outfitting backyards and decks, says Frank Marchese, the company's category manager specialist.

"Years ago, people would come food shopping and pick up items for their backyard. Now, we've become their one-stop shop."

With everything in-store, including patio sets, umbrellas, lounge chairs, hammocks, patio lights and barbecues, Marchese says, Fortinos – with 20 stores across southern Ontario – can handle all of a customer's outdoor living needs.

Patio sets range from $189 to high-end sets at $599, which are usually made up of 10 pieces, including cushioned chairs. "There is one for every budget and every family size," he says.

"Prices are kept low because everything is self-assembled. Assembly is easy, however. Even first-time buyers have no trouble following instructions," he says.

"We stand by our products, which are of the highest quality at the lowest possible retail price. When people see our products – at least one of each piece is on display – at the store, they know they're getting the best for the best price."

Once the patio furniture is set up, he says, it's time to accessorize with stepping stones, backyard statues, windmills and fountains, "not to mention an important item in any backyard – the barbecue.

"Especially popular are our gazebos, which can be assembled on the deck or across the back lawn. We cannot get enough in. With more and more people wanting to stay out of the sun, the gazebo is the answer to an afternoon in the backyard."

At a price of about $199, he says, the gazebos can be left out all year long. "If after a few winters outside they need to be replaced, the low price makes that feasible."

When it comes to gardens, says Marchese, Fortinos hasn't forgotten about plants and flowers. "We have everything you need to brighten up your flowerbeds, including bedding plants, annuals, shrubs, grass seed, as well as plant foods, fertilizers and gardening equipment."

Staff are always available, he says, to answer gardening questions. "We're starting the season for backyard entertaining, and we want to make sure customers get everything they could ever want for their backyard at our stores."

Baby strollers come in an array of colours and styles.

Bring home baby safely and in style

By SYLVIA BROOKE
Special to The CJN

When you bring home your baby, everything's new – the experience, the emotions, the environment – but also the equipment, the furniture, the accessories. With a little expertise in that department, all areas in this new life should fall into place.

The knowledgeable staff at Dear-Born (905-881-3334) is available to help new parents with this often baffling maze. As Cathy Scott, company founder explains, "we're dealing basically with the first-time mom and the new baby. We're a full-service, specialty baby store."

In their warm atmosphere, you can find whatever you need – cribs, cradles, high chairs, change tables, car seats, strollers and layettes. Children's photographer David Amoils even has a studio on site. Their selection includes such trusted names as Greco, Britax, Dutailier, Absorba, Kooshies, Osh Kosh and Perego.

"We're the largest Perego retailer in Ontario," Scott says. They're also an authorized Perego repair centre.

Dear-Born has a computerized gift registry. This can be most helpful, especially to those living outside the city. They can simply phone in their gift choice, confident that it will be the right one.

Scott founded the store 25 years ago to focus on giving customers special attention. The store philosophy remains the same. They take special orders and offer full service; they will even install your child's car seats, to ensure they are installed correctly for maximum safety.

Everyone knows safety is the number one concern around babies, and Babyproofers Limited (416-561-2524) is a child safety specialist. Owner Yehudah Franken is a member of the International Association for Child Safety.

His private consultation service emphasizes recognizing and preventing potential dangers. He looks at a living environment from a child's eye view, spotting sharp corners, unlocked cabinets and open doors, and customizes it with the child's safety in mind. Gates and magnetic locks for doors and drawers are installed, door stopper and doorknob covers are provided, as are toilet locks and covers for the spout in the bathtub.

As prevention is the best medicine, he checks the hot water setting and lowers it if necessary. This is the best way to avoid scalds or burns.

Franken says his at-home service "saves people a lot of time, and it's much more convenient to have someone come to the home."

He provides parents with tips on how to make the home environment safer. For instance, he warns them about allowing pots and pans to be made into playthings.

Franken says there should be a respectable distance between children and these household items in order to prevent familiarity and potential tragedy should a child grab a boiling pot off the stove. "I show that there are a lot of things one can do to make the home safer, now and later."

Furnishing children's rooms takes a lot of planning. The shift from baby to child and later to teen furniture should be a smooth one. The staff at Kiddies World of Furniture (905-624-9092) are experts in that transition. With its complete line of tot to teen furniture, it provides one-stop furniture shopping for all the kids in the family.

First opened by Jerry White as a baby furniture shop, White realized that as his clients grew older their furniture needs changed. In the late '80's, he introduced age-appropriate furniture for the young student. Cribs, change tables and gliders could now be replaced with beds, desks and night tables. All are available at great prices and styles to suit the most particular adolescent taste.

Jerry's son Shawn, has since joined the business. He explains how Kiddies World of Furniture can offer such a selection to this wide age range. "We are the biggest retail store from baby to teen in the Greater Toronto Area – our store is about 15,000 square feet." They typically have 85 crib sets on display and 50 different styles of strollers shown on the floor at any time.

With professional knowledge and personalized service, one can shop the gamut from playpens to rugs to battery-operated cars.

"We have a huge range of linen," notes Shawn, "because each crib has its own set." Such established names as Pali, AP Industries and Canadian-made Ragazzi furniture are well represented.

Kosher lamp changes Shabbat

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

A revolutionary invention now enables observant Jews to dim a light, or turn it on or off on the Sabbath or yom tov.

The halachically approved Kosher-Lamp invented by Rabbi Shmuel Veffer, gives off light or shuts off the light when you rotate an inner shade.

Rabbi Veffer of Aish HaTorah Village Shul, says the idea for the lamp originated when his wife Chana, who is an avid reader, asked if he could improvise a light so she could read in the bedroom on the Sabbath.

"After a visit to the local hardware store with my son," he says, "we came home with some hodgepodge parts, and by the end of the day we had put together the first clunky working model. By the following Sabbath, our children and friends wanted one."

Soon after, the rabbi approached Moshe Orzech, one of his congregants who is in the lighting importing business, and with a handshake, a partnership was formed to produce and distribute the KosherLamp.

"After seeing the working model," says Orzech, "I immediately understood the potential. A lamp you can turn on and off on Shabbat — the possibilities were endless."

Orzech set off for China to build a prototype, and Rabbi Veffer continued to refine the KosherLamp design.

The rabbi, who has a degree from the University of Waterloo in mathematics and computer sciences, designed a website.

As well, he approached a number of rabbis in Canada, the United States and Israel and received halachic approval, and then registered the concept with the patent office.

He says that the lamp has many uses, not only for observant Jews but for anyone who wants to read but does not want to disturb another person in the room.

The design is simple but ingenious, he says.

There are two independent cylinders, each with its own window. The inner cylinder can be rotated with a simple twist. When the two windows are aligned, the light comes out. When they are not aligned, the light is blocked and stays inside the lamp. You can adjust the cylinder to allow partial light.

Rabbi Veffer says that halachically, you can open and close a cupboard that has a light on inside on the Sabbath.

That principal applies with the KosherLamp. When you open the inner shade, the light remains on and when it is closed, the light is not visible.

The cost of the KosherLamp is $39.95 in Canada and includes the bulb and all taxes. The lamp can be shipped anywhere in North America.

For more information on the KosherLamp or to order, call 416-487-5483 or 1-866-661-5483, or online www.kosherlamp.com.

Israeli sandstone versatile and durable

Carmel Stone Decor (905-479-8067), manufacturer of sandstone home accessories and architecture, can introduce homeowners to a broad range of design options made of imported Jerusalem sandstone, says company president Carmela Lombardi.

With years of combined experience and talents, Israeli and Palestinian artisans use local Jerusalem sandstone to create superior crafted tables, shelving, columns, crowns, rails and archways, she says. The artisans hand-chisel each piece with pride, creating unique and opulent looking accessories for your home.

Historically, architecture from the Middle East has included homes, buildings, and temples that have all withstood the test of time, says Lombardi. "Landscaping with sandstone slabs provides a safe and desired appearance."

She explains that sandstone is a type of sedimentary rock made from accumulated particles of sand deposited by water, glaciers or wind.

The porous texture, non-fading colours, and earthly beauty of the stone will be admired and appreciated for many years to come, she says.

"Sandstone, whether used indoors or outdoors, offers versatility, durability and longevity. When properly sealed, natural stone is simple to care for and to maintain. Nothing is added to the stone process, so it is 100 per cent sandstone."

Because the products are heavy – approximately 150 lbs per cubic foot – Lombardi says it is important to ensure that there is adequate structural support to hold the load.

Thickness is dependent on use, she says. "For building and landscaping, its thickness varies and can be about 1.25 inches. For furniture, the thickness varies from one to 1.25 inches."

In addition to home furnishings, building and landscaping, she says, "sandstone can be used for monuments, fireplaces, mantels and hearths or plaques, and pieces can be customized. Your creativity and imagination makes [its uses] limitless."

Sandstone products are by sent by ship in crates and require six to eight weeks for delivery. Custom orders may take up to 12 weeks. Delivery to homes is arranged through a local carrier.

Carmel Stone Decor is open to the public by appointment only.

Montreal police charge three in UTT firebombing

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Three people, including a mother and son, were charged in connection with the April 5 firebombing of the United Talmud Torahs (UTT) library in St. Laurent.

Simon Zogheib and Sleiman Elmerhebi, both 18, were charged May 15 with four counts each of arson, possession of incendiary material, conspiracy and uttering threats. Elmerhebi's mother Rouba Elmerhebi Fahd, 36, was charged with being an accessory after the fact.

All three pleaded not guilty at their arraignment in Quebec Court and elected to be tried by judge and jury. They were detained until a bail hearing, which was set for this past Monday.

Not guilty pleas entered at arraignment

They were arrested at about 6:15 a.m., May 14. Two other men, both 18, were also arrested at that time, but after questioning, they were released because of lack of evidence.

Police said the investigation continues and more charges and more arrests could be made. The investigation is being conducted in collaboration with the RCMP and Sûreté du Québec.

According to the Globe and Mail, the suspects are of Lebanese origin and neighbours say they are Christian. Elmerhebi and Fahd have reportedly been living as tenants in a duplex in St. Laurent near the school for about five years. Zogheib, who lives in the north end of Montreal, is a university student, the Gazette reported.

Notes left at the scene claimed the firebombing was in retaliation for Israel's assassination of Hamas spiritual leader Sheikh Ahmed Yassin.

Sifting the blood-soaked sand

The conflict in Gaza took on a heightened violent dimension last week. Thirteen IDF soldiers were killed in three separate incidents; Some 30 Palestinians were killed and 88 homes demolished. These photos show IDF soldiers painstakingly probing the sand for the remains of fellow soldiers killed in Rafah. Palestinians at first refused to surrender the body parts of IDF soldiers who were killed when their vehicles were bombed.

Zundel Appeal Dashed

TORONTO — The Ontario Court of Appeal last week ruled it doesn't have jurisdiction to hear Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel's challenge to a "security certificate" issued against him. The certificate, based on secret intelligence and signed by two cabinet ministers empowered by federal anti-terror laws, declares him a danger to Canada who should be deported to his native Germany. Zundel has been in jail since Ottawa started deportation proceedings against him 15 months ago, when U.S. authorities dumped him at the border for overstaying a visitor's visa. The Federal Court of Canada has been hearing his case in secret. He could remain in jail while it finishes its work, or seek to have the Supreme Court overturn the latest ruling.

Cdn. Wexner Winners

TORONTO — Four Canadians have won Wexner Graduate Fellowships from the U.S.-based Wexner Foundation. Torontonians Adam Cutler, a former University of Toronto student, will begin rabbinical studies in the fall at the Jewish Theological Seminary, while fellow Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto graduate Yona Shem-Tov, a former CHAT Jewish history teacher, will start a PhD in Jewish history at New York University. Torontonian David Koffman, a graduate of Northern Secondary school and the University of Toronto, will also start doctoral studies in history and Judaic studies at NYU, while Rabbi Noam Silverman, a Montrealer and a graduate of Hebrew Academy and Yeshiva University, will attend Stanford University for religious studies. The two-year renewable fellowships cover tuition and living expenses for graduate training in Jewish education, Jewish communal service, the rabbinate, the cantorate and Jewish studies.

JAFI Reps Detained

AUCKLAND, N.Z. — The Israeli Embassy in New Zealand is probing the detention at Auckland Airport of the treasurer of the Jewish Agency for Israel earlier this month. Treasurer Shai Hermesh and senior consultant Yigal Sela were detained by customs agents for several hours on suspicion they were Mossad agents or drug-runners or were illegally transporting food across borders. Sela said the agents told them, "We are treating all you Israelis the same. You are nothing but drug dealers and spies." The incident came after recent allegations that two Israelis arrested and charged with fraudulently trying to obtain New Zealand passports were Mossad agents. The JAFI pair were on a fact-finding trip to the South Pacific.

Drabinsky's Sequel to John in Doubt

TORONTO — Plans by ex-theatre impresario Garth Drabinsky to film another Jesus-centred epic to follow last year's The Gospel of John are on hold because his production company, Visual Bible International (VBI), is in financial trouble, the Globe and Mail reported.

Drabinsky had said production on The Gospel of Mark was to start in Toronto and Spain this summer using John's creative team. But the actor who played Jesus has yet to be offered the part again, while the studio where many John interiors were shot hasn't been booked and the scholars advising VBI have yet to discuss a third draft of the script, the Globe reported.

A spokesperson for Toronto-based VBI, which hopes to film all 66 books of the Christian Bible by 2015, said no decision has been made on what its next film may be, and its new CEO said it's "three or four months behind schedule."

VBI, which has seen most of its board resign in a recent management controversy, sold only 40,000 VHS and DVD copies of the John film in 2003, well short of its 600,000 target. VBI has said that if it doesn't meet new sales targets, it could default on debt and cease operations.

Hate Crime Sentence

MELBOURNE — An Australian man has received a suspended sentence for violent threats against the local Jewish community, the first time a conviction has been recorded for a crime against Jews in Melbourne. Stephen Kennedy, 44, was found guilty recently of making a death threat and of using a telecommunications device for harassment for a six-minute recording on the answering machine of the Jewish Community Council of Victoria. Further incidents while he is serving his sentence will result in jail time, he was told.

Oz Bomb Trial Delayed

PERTH — The trial of Jack Roche, an Australian man accused of plotting to bomb the Israeli Embassy, was delayed last week after some jurors read a newspaper article that defence lawyers said would affect their impartiality toward the British-born convert to Islam.

Duke Serves Whites

NEW ORLEANS — White supremacist David Duke, released from jail to a Louisiana halfway house last month, is doing community service with his "white civil rights group." Duke had served a year for fraud. "My work-release plan was approved in the normal channels," he told the New York Times. The website for his group, the European-American Unity and Rights Organization, says it's an answer to the Anti-Defamation League and other "anti-European" U.S. groups.

Throwing for Palestine?

ATHENS — A Greek javelin thrower who has not competed since the early 1990s has petitioned the International Olympic Committee to compete under the Palestinian flag at the Athens Olympics in August. Sofia Sakorafa, 47, who broke the women's javelin world record in 1982, says she has become a Palestinian citizen and hopes to compete for the Palestinian team. She said she wanted "to serve the universal [human] spirit that is still being produced today from the ancient Greek spirit."

Former citizenship judge lauded for community work

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

He rose from the ashes of the Holocaust and made "never again" his mission, working for human rights and social justice across the globe.

For his righteous efforts, former citizenship judge Sigmund Reiser, 80, was recently honoured as the inaugural recipient of the Yakir Hakahal Award, literally "precious to the community."

"I feel humbled receiving this honour," Reiser told 450 guests gathered at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue for the gala award dinner, proceeds of which will go to the Sigmund Reiser Fund for Truth and Justice in Race Relations. "I feel I am accepting this on behalf of all the survivors of the Shoah who came to Canada."

Reiser said education is the best means to prevent and confront discrimination, and called for "an official program in the curriculum [dealing with] anti-Semitism and bigotry."

He also spoke of the need to build bridges with other ethnic groups, particularly with the ethnic press, to foster understanding and tolerance.

Many public servants and community leaders Reiser has worked with, including Liberal MP Art Eggleton, Liberal MPP Monte Kwinter and former Liberal MP Robert Kaplan, attended the dinner.

Among the speakers were Reiser's grandson Jonathan Guberman, event chair Gerald Hartman, Beth Emeth rabbis Howard Morrison and David Bauman and synagogue president Pearl Grundland.

The keynote speaker was federal Justice Minister Irwin Cotler, who spoke about fighting anti-Semitism and all forms of bigotry.

The presence of so many people engaged in community service was rather fitting, given that Reiser's biography reads like a case study of tireless volunteerism.

Within years of the Polish immigrant's arrival in Canada, Reiser excelled as a leading insurance sales agent with London Life. He earned a series of promotions, eventually landing in Toronto, where he began his community service endeavours.

At the urging of his wife of 59 years, Carole, Reiser became involved at Beth Emeth and had a leadership role in several Jewish organizations, including B'nai Brith Canada, the Jewish National Fund, State of Israel Bonds, Canadian Society for Yad Vashem, The League for Human Rights Cabinet and the Robert Kaplan Scholarship Fund.

Since he had lost 21 relatives in the Shoah, human rights became a major cause for Reiser. He has served on the Canadian Human Rights Commission and in the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario and was appointed a citizenship judge in 1998.

Among his achievements in that role was speaking to 15,000 elementary school students about Canadian values and citizenship obligations.

In the political sphere, the Liberal party member was campaign manager for Kaplan in 1988 and Eggleton in 1993 and 1998. Reiser also contributed to the elections of Kwinter and former Ontario MPP Elinor Caplan.

For his accomplishments, Reiser has received numerous awards – most notably he was named a member of the Order of Canada in 1997 and received the Golden Jubilee Medal in 2002.

In his keynote address, Cotler extolled Reiser for being a model tzaddik.

"You are a veritable, full-time volunteer, a true advocate for justice," Cotler said. "You give meaning to the protection of human dignity."

Cotler condemned the recent escalation of anti-Semitic acts in Canada and internationally and outlined several ways to combat anti-Semitism and bigotry, including the establishment of hate crimes units, increased anti-racist education and intercultural dialogue.

"We will consign anti-Semitism to the dustbin of history where it belongs," Cotler pronounced. "We will not be silent, we will not be intimidated, we will speak up."

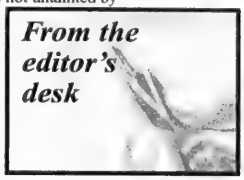
Reflections about integrity

Integrity is the chief currency of all news and media outlets. We trade on our credibility. The bargain we strike with our readers is a simple one: for our readers' loyalty we promise to provide news that is reliable, fair, honestly compiled and untainted by personal prejudice or bias.

Editorials, commentaries, analyses and opinions, of course, are not untainted by personal prejudice or bias. Indeed, personal prejudice and bias are their very essence.



When a mistake or error creeps into a news story, we take remedial steps that include, at a minimum, correcting the record at the first available opportunity. Integrity demands nothing less. And we expect the same from all news sources upon whom consumers innocently, in good faith, rely for honest news reporting.

Unfortunately, not all news sources act with equal dispatch or vigour when their integrity is on the line. Two cases from last week tell very different tales about the emphasis on integrity of some media outlets.

Case 1: London's Daily Mirror recently published some photographs that depicted the abuse of Iraqi prisoners by British soldiers. One of the infamous photos showed a soldier urinating on a captive. But the photos, it turned out, were all doctored. They were false documents.

The newspaper's board of directors took immediate remedial steps. "There is sufficient evidence to suggest that these pictures are fakes," the board's press release said. The Mirror apologized for the mistruths it unwittingly perpetrated on its readers and then, correctly, dismissed the editor, Piers Morgan, because, he apparently knew the photos were fakes.

Morgan, however, was unrepentant. "The pictures accurately illustrated the reality about the appalling conduct of some British troops," he said.

In his own mind, Morgan justified the publication of cut-and-paste photos because he believed they illustrated the "appalling conduct of some British troops" somewhere in Iraq.

They were not actual images of appalling conduct. Indeed, the appalling conduct depicted in the photos did not occur. But Morgan believed "some British troops," somewhere in Iraq, must have been guilty of "appalling conduct." So he concocted an illustration as it were, of what his imagination – his prejudices and biases – offered up as likely appalling conduct by British troops in Iraq, and presented it to the public as reliable news.

Morgan's dismissal from his post was entirely appropriate. He was made to account for his behaviour.

Case 2: Two weeks ago, CBC TV ran a news story by Neil Macdonald from Washington concerning the revelations of the torture of Iraqi captives by some American prison guards at the Abu Ghraib prison.

Macdonald's angle on the story was unusual: "The occupation of Iraq and George Bush's unprecedented alliance with the right-wing government of Israel has placed Americans overseas in danger."

To prove his point about Bush's "unprecedented alliance with the right-wing government of Israel," Macdonald lined up an on-camera statement by a former American diplomat, Eugene Bird, who is now a widely known anti-Israel lobbyist in Washington.

"We know that the Israeli intelligence was operating in Baghdad after the war was over. The question should be: were there any foreign interrogators among those that were recommending very, very bad treatment for the prisoners?" Bird said.

The purpose of Macdonald's report was quite transparent: to associate the unfolding Abu Ghraib torture scandal with Israel. But there is no such association. Nor did Macdonald introduce any evidence of such an association.

Three days later, the CBC issued a clarification regarding Macdonald's unconscionable news report: "In a report on the U.S. abuse of Iraqi prisoners, we included a comment from a news conference by retired American diplomats criticizing U.S. Middle East policy. A representative of the group suggested that Israeli intelligence might be linked in some way to the abuse at the prison. The fact is there is no evidence that Israel was involved in what happened in the Iraqi prison. The comment from the diplomat should not have been included in the report and we regret the error."

But the clarification was seen by viewers as grudging, weak and hollow. In an effort to stem the rising tide of anger, the corporation's news editor-in-chief, Tony Burman, issued a further statement of clarification a week later explaining the report had suffered "due to editorial lapses that somehow slipped through the system."

Burman denied that there had been any "wilful distortion" by Macdonald. Technically, Burman may be correct. Macdonald did not "distort" Bird's words. Rather, he cleverly manipulated them. But Macdonald concocted a news report, as surely as Piers Morgan concocted a photograph. He effectively grafted Bird's outrageous slander against Israel to the Israel-as-endangerer-of-Americans-overseas theory that informed the beginning of his news report. However, Macdonald was not peddling news. He was peddling his prejudices and biases. If the concoction was wilful, which it was, then the resulting distortion had to be wilful as well.

The difference in the way the two cases were handled should open our eyes to what the CBC has become and to the low standard to which they appear to hew in protecting their own integrity. —MBD

Israelis resilient amid terror: Haifa U professor

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the face of an unprecedented wave of Palestinian terrorism, the most important weapons Jews in Israel have at their disposal are their optimism, resiliency and faith in the future, an Israeli social scientist said last week.

"The enemy is strong, but we're stronger," declared Gabriel Ben-Dor, a Haifa University professor of political science and academic director of the National Security College, Israel's West Point.

Delivering the first of two Harry Posen Memorial Lectures at Holy Blossom Temple, Ben-Dor acknowledged that about 80 per cent of Jewish Israelis regard terrorism as an existential and personal threat.

> 'The enemy is strong, but we're stronger'

Yet more than eight out of 10 Israelis are confident of Israel's ability to face the challenge posed by terrorism and are willing "to stick it out."

As well, nine out of 10 Israeli Jews believe the Israeli armed forces are winning the war against terrorism, noted Ben-Dor, citing data from a study he and his colleagues recently completed.

"We, as a society, have responded well to the threat of terrorism," he said, adding that 86 per cent to 91 per cent of Jewish Israelis are patriotic and love Israel.

The comparable figure for Israeli Arabs is considerably lower, he pointed out. They will have to decide where they stand in the struggle between Israel and the Palestinians.

Haredim are increasingly proud of Israel, and non-Jews from the former Soviet Union who have settled in Israel with their Jewish spouses and relatives are just as patriotic as settlers in the territories.

The average Israeli has a low opinion of the Knesset, politicians and the media. But they admire the Israeli army and the Supreme Court, believing they are above the fray.

Palestinian terrorism has increased in scope and intensity since the outbreak of the second intifadah, he said.

During the early years of Israeli statehood, terrorists usually came from neighbouring Arab countries. But today, they hail from the West Bank and Gaza, and tend to be less educated and poorer than in the past.

Fatah, controlled by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, perpetrates about one-third of all suicide attacks, said Ben-Dor.

But Islamic fundamentalist groups such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad enjoy greater support than Palestinian secular organizations.

Israel needs to separate from the Palestinians, and the sooner the better, because the Arab-Israeli conflict has dangerously morphed into a confrontation between two distinct societies, Ben-Dor said.

"The sooner we're able to draw our boundaries, the more secure we'll be."

Israel's decision in the wake of the Six Day War to integrate the territories into its economy was a mistake, an "unqualified disaster," he said, referring to Moshe Dayan's Open Bridges policy.

In his estimation, the security fence currently being built through the West Bank will become a security barrier in the short run but a political boundary over a longer period of time.

He added that the level of terrorism has declined drastically in areas where there is a fence.

A ripple of surprise coursed through the audience when Ben-Dor claimed that the Palestinians have received more economic aid from the European Union in recent years than Europe received from the United States under the Marshall Plan after World War II.

HARRIS HONOURED: Milton Harris, chair and CEO of Harris Steel Group Inc., centre, was honoured last week by the Native Men's Residence (Na-Me-Res) on Vaughan Road for his donation of $250,000 to the Tumivut Youth Centre for homeless young people. Harris, a well-known Jewish activist, was joined at the unveiling of a plaque by Avrum Rosensweig, left, executive director of Ve'Ahavta, which has partnered with the Aboriginal community on many projects, and by Greg Rogers, executive director of Na-Me-Res. She'arim to honour outgoing CJC national president

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Keith Landy

Keith Landy, local lawyer and outgoing national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, will be honoured by Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School, Sara and Sam Hennick Education Centre, on June 15 at Le Parc Hotel.

She'arim is Canada's first and only Jewish day school for children from all religious backgrounds who have learning disabilities including Asperger's Syndrome and/or attention deficit (hyperactivity) disorder.

In conjunction with Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, She'arim was recently involved in a fundraising campaign to move into its current premises at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Landy, vice-president of the World Jewish Congress, a member of the executive committee of the Conference on Jewish Material Claims and a recipient of The Queen's Golden Jubilee Medal, said he did not hesitate to accept the honour from the school, which had 68 students when it moved into the BJCC three years ago, and now has 100.

"I agreed on the basis that the focus of the evening is on the school, not on me.

"She'arim is a small school with a waiting list for [students] who, when given the right [opportunity], go on to excel in any and all fields of endeavours.

"It provides all the benefits of a Jewish day school education in an individualized setting. I encourage everyone, [whether or not they have] children, to view She'arim as a community treasure. There should never be a child on a waiting list."

In Landy's three-year term as CJC president, he served as counsel at the Somalia Inquiry, was instrumental in the passage of Holocaust Memorial Day and Yom HaShoah in the Ontario Legislature, and was a delegate at the United Nations World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in 2001.

The success of any community position is measured in small amounts, he said.

"Any achievements, however small, are worthwhile."

When his term began, the second intifadah was gearing up "with weekly and almost daily horrors in the Middle East," he said.

"The community had been lulled into a complacency since the '90s, through the Oslo accords and through the spectre of possible peace in the Middle East. North American Jewry, particularly, was at a place where anti-Semitism such as was present in pre-war Europe, was unheard of."

Then came Durban, he said, "which is now a metaphor for hate, anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism.

"From that point forward, it became apparent to the larger community that there was a convergence of anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism. It became difficult to simply say, 'We are criticizing Israel, but we are not anti-Semitic.' That became difficult to sustain as a concept."

As bad as the local spate of recent anti-Semitic acts have been, Landy said, it took time before the public began taking the issue seriously.

"In and of themselves, the incidents were small in terms of impact; there was no loss of life. Each one, however, is horrendous and unacceptable.

"[We at Congress] woke the community to the dangers, and sensitized politicians to the point where there has been a clear denunciation of every attack that has occurred."

A "wonderful" aspect of his term, he said, was the opportunity he had to visit small communities across the country.

"Every [Canadian Jew] needs to see the hunger people in smaller communities have for Jewish community events. It is the role of Congress to unite these communities."

It was a highlight for him stand on Parliament Hill at a rally for Israel in April 2002, he said. "Ottawa has a warm and welcoming Jewish community, and we are lucky to have its support."

A native of England who was raised in South Africa, Landy said that Canada is a community of immigrants.

"When we get together with other ethno-cultural groups we get a sense of the [uniqueness of Canada], and we can espouse Canadian values.

"From that perspective, that is what drives me. It has been a privilege to serve the community, and if the right opportunity arises, I will get involved again. Once you are involved, it is hard not to remain involved."

An upcoming triennial national plenary assembly for the installation of new CJC officers is set to take place in Ottawa in June. Landy said it will be a scaled down event because of its proximity to the federal election, adding that politicians who would typically attend the plenary will be tied up with the election instead.

Canada will be an Al Qaeda target: terror expert

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

A panel of terror experts agrees Canada will certainly be attacked by Al Qaeda and is not prepared to deal with the impending crisis.

"Some day Al Qaeda is going to launch a successful attack in Canada. That is a reality," says John Thompson, president of the Mackenzie Institute.

"This is a threat we should all be taking seriously."

Thompson was speaking as part of a panel on terrorism at a recent town hall discussion called "Global Terrorism: Is Canada at Risk" in North York, organized by The Speakers Action Group.

Besides Thompson, the panel included National Post reporter Stewart Bell and Owen Sound police chief Tom Kaye. The moderator was Leo Adler, national affairs director at the Canadian Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center.

Kaye said Canada's dwindling and poorly funded military, as well as inadequately trained and equipped emergency services personnel, do not have the resources to respond sufficiently to an attack.

"There are 60,000 to 70,000 people in the army. You could put them all in the Skydome," Kaye said, noting Canada's per capita funding of the military is 80 per cent lower than in the United States.

Kaye said an anti-terrorism response team has been established by the Ontario Provincial Police, but it, too, is limited.

"It's only 32 people... and [how] could the team come into Toronto where they don't have jurisdiction?" Kaye said.

Bell, the author of Cold Terror: How Canada Nurtures and Exports Terrorism Around the World, said as many as 50 terrorist groups operate in Canada, primarily using the country for recruitment and fundraising, the forging of passports and the dissemination of propaganda.

"Our open society is exploited by the terrorists," Bell said, adding that Canada's poor record at deporting suspected terrorists has contributed to the presence of terrorist cells.

He cited a number of recent Canadian terror suspects, including Ahmed Said Khadr, an Al Qaeda member whose family continues to live in Canada, and Hezbollah cell operatives who "used Canada almost as a Costco."

Bell said the Hezbollah members, who resided in Vancouver, helped finance the terror group's activities but were not convicted because Canada did not have a law against fundraising for terrorism.

The panellists agreed that Osama bin Laden's mention of Canada in November 2002 as a "country that should be attacked" should be taken seriously, especially since Canada is the only country bin Laden named that has not yet been hit.

"Al Qaeda is gunning for us," Bell said. "They see us as an infidel country."

The panellists urged Canadians to put more pressure on elected officials on the issue of security.

"There is a huge disconnect between what the public wants and what the politicians are giving," said Kaye.

"The government has to know people want to be safe... that at least we'll be in a position to respond."

During a question and answer period, an audience member whose husband was killed in the 9/11 attacks echoed the panellist's views and her own disappointment at Canada's lack of support for 9/11 victims.

"There is nothing in place for terrorist victims," said Maureen Basnicky. "My government has let me down."

Party to help young Jews show solidarity with Israel

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

If you're between the ages of 19 and 26, want to party with hundreds of people from across Toronto, and are interested in supporting a worthy cause, then mark May 23 on your calendar.

L'CHAIM 2004, a charity event hosted by Van Warner Entertainment and UJA Federation, will be held Sunday night at 10 p.m. at the Capitol Event Theatre, 2492 Yonge St.

In association with the AEPi fraternity, the Birthright Israel Alumni Committee Toronto, the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students and Hillel Western, the first annual fundraiser will bring together young Jewish adults to celebrate their unity and show solidarity with Israel, said organizer Daniel Warner.

"It's a great cause, at a great venue, on a great weekend," he said.

Warner, a University of Western Ontario business student, is no stranger to the party industry.

As London's AEPi social executive for this past school year, he organized events such as Splash Bash, Rock with Israel, and the Unity Party.

He came up with the idea for L'CHAIM 2004 after visiting Israel on a Birthright trip in June 2003. Inspired by a trip leader who urged participants to become active in the Jewish community, Warner said he is doing his part by organizing this function.

Warner said he has been working with Annie Raphael, a post-program planner with Birthright, who has been "a great help on all ends" in bringing L'CHAIM 2004 to life.

"Our goal is to raise $5,000 for the UJA Federation Walk with Israel and Magen David Adom," Warner said.

He said he has been raising money for Magen David Adom, AEPi's national charity, throughout the year.

Promoting UJA Federation's Walk with Israel, which takes place Sunday, May 30, has been his attempt to encourage people "to be more active," he said.

Warner is optimistic L'CHAIM 2004 will be a success, and expects a turnout of about 600.

The event will open with a performance by the Mill Street Band and will feature DJ Mr. Nice Guy.

Tickets can be purchased in advance for $10 by calling Warner at 416-540-7373. Tickets at the door will be $15.

Anyone interested in volunteering their time can contact Warner.

A warning

Thirty-seven years ago yesterday, on the 28th day of Iyar, June 7, the Israel Defence Forces reunited Old City with New City Jerusalem. The divided capital had been a snapshot of time frozen 19 years earlier, blood-soaked in the fiery aftermath of Israel's War of Independence. When fighting stopped, the Jordanians ruled east Jerusalem and Muslim authorities controlled the Jewish holy places of the Old City. Such was the nature of their control that Israeli Jews were prevented from worshipping at the Western Wall, synagogues were destroyed, cemeteries were vandalized and holy Jewish sites were desecrated.

Today, Muslim authorities are again making pronouncements about control over Israel's capital. And we must all take notice, for a significant threat may soon hover over the next horizon. Ha'aretz journalist Nadav Shragai (see the Perspectives page) sums up the resurgent Islamic claim to the Jewish capital: "In the last generation, the Islamic and Arab history of Jerusalem has gradually been rewritten. At the heart of this new version is the Arabs' historic right to Jerusalem and Palestine. The main argument is that the Arabs ruled Jerusalem thousands of years before the children of Israel. In addition to building the Arab-Muslim case, the Muslim thinkers are formulating a denial and negation of the Jewish-Zionist narrative. Included in that effort is the de-Judaizing of the Temple Mount, the Western Wall and Jerusalem as a whole."

Shragai observes that the new theological-historical campaign by Muslim authorities to uproot the Jews from ancient Israel was already well entrenched in 2000, when then-prime minister Ehud Barak was negotiating with Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat at Camp David.

"The myth of the fabricated Temple is the greatest crime of historical forgery," Egyptian archeologist Abe al-Rahim Riham Barakat has written. Barakat's opinion does not appear to be a minority opinion among Muslim clerics. PA-appointed Sheikh Akram Sabria, the mufti of Jerusalem, has said that there are "no remains proving the Jews' claim that there was a temple at the site of the Western Wall."

Only the short-sighted among us will fail to see that the campaign to remove the Jewish connection from ancient Israel is, at the same time, a campaign to remove the western connection. If Jerusalem was not holy to the Jews, it could not have been holy to Jesus. And only those same short-sighted individuals will fail to grasp further that the fight against the Islamic forces who preach a de-Judaized Holy Land is also the fight against the same Islamic forces who preach terror against the West.

Though he spoke the following words in 1949 when the UN debated the internationalization of Jerusalem, David Ben-Gurion's words speak to us today no less forcefully than when he spoke them aloud to a hostile world. " A nation that, for 2,500 years, has faithfully adhered to the vow made by the first exiles by the waters of Babylon not to forget Jerusalem, will never agree to be separated from Jerusalem."

On Yom Yerushalayim, we recall Ben-Gurion's words and bear in mind the warning that is taking ugly shape.

Asking about community priorities

How ironic is the headline, "The Future Face of Jewish Toronto" (CJN, May 13), which refers to the community's plans for expansion and development – as if one could personify concrete structures? In the view of a growing significant group of parents, "the future face of Jewish Toronto" looks quite grim, as hundreds of parents are increasingly leaving the day-school system due to the escalating costs of Jewish education. Funds that could have benefited hearts and minds are now being diverted to bricks and glass.

Where are our priorities? It is commonly accepted that a Jewish education is the best antidote for assimilation and intermarriage. Community centres, no matter how beautiful, do not have that power. I can foresee a day in our not-too-distant future when our magnificent community institutions will be devoid of Jews and will stand as a stark reminder of our misguided priorities.

Will Jews fill the buildings?

Under the headline "The Future Face of Jewish Toronto" on the front page of The CJN's May 13 issue are artist conceptions of two impressive planned community building projects in the GTA, which we are told will cost $250 million to build. Much good work will no doubt be done in these buildings, and those who support this endeavour deserve great appreciation and encouragement.

However, the "future face of Jewish Toronto" will surely be the face of proud Jews, not the façade of buildings, however impressive. And the only reliable, time-tested way of ensuring this human Jewish continuity is Jewish education. Yet Jewish education in Ontario is in a state of deepening crisis, as tuition increases above the rate of inflation over the last decade have squeezed the middle class slowly out of Jewish day schools and forced many Jewish families to have fewer children.

Non-discriminatory government funding of Jewish schools, equal to funding for Catholic schools, is just one possible solution. In the meantime, the Jewish community can require every community member, as a condition of membership in a shul or enrolment in a school (and simply as a matter of good conscience), to pledge five per cent of their family estate by will to support Jewish day-school education.

Unless the current crisis in day-school funding is addressed with the same vigour by our community organizations and philanthropists as they now devote to buildings, we cannot be assured that there will be enough Jews around to fill those magnificent buildings with their good works.

Koren is wrong

In his Hebrew language column from The CJN April 22, Gidi Koren wrote the following (roughly translated):

"Israel should evacuate, as quickly as possible, all Palestinian territories. As long as Israeli soldiers are killed in order to protect little children with long peyot in Hebron, tens of thousands of young Israelis will continue to emigrate to Europe and North America."

How dare he vilify one of the most patriotic and devoted segments of Israeli society – the religious settlers! These families, who daily risk their love for the land and whose boys join the toughest units in the Israel Defence Forces and are devoted to Torah values, are a source of pride. To blame them for the departure of "westernized" Israelis to the West is not only false but divisive, at a time when we should be fostering unity.

Incidentally, I remind Koren that Hamas, Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, Islamic Jihad, the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, the Tanzim, Fatah and the Palestinian Authority have all demanded in Arabic that Jews must leave Haifa and Tel Aviv, not only the West Bank and Gaza. Does Koren really expect peace and tranquillity to come once we leave the "territories?"

Three out of nine Jewish justices?

Canadians are currently waiting to see which two new Supreme Court of Canada appointees will replace Justices Iacobucci and Arbour when they leave the Court in June.

The first Jewish justice of the Supreme Court of Canada was Bora Laskin, who was appointed chief justice by then-prime minister Pierre Trudeau. Another Jew did not take a seat on the Supreme Court of Canada until the recent appointment by former prime minister Jean Chretién of Justice Morris Fish. It is interesting to note that four of the leading contenders for the current openings in the Supreme Court of Canada are Jewish.

Notwithstanding a few isolated recent incidents of anti-Semitism in Canada, Canadians can take great pride in the fact their county is a tolerant society that simply does not tolerate anti-Semitism. It will be interesting to see if, after all the candidates are reviewed and it turns out the two most qualified people are Jewish, Canada will be prepared to accept three Jewish justices out of nine on the Supreme Court.

A campaign of denial to disinherit the Jews

By NADAV SHRAGAI

Years ago, a group of archeology students from Bar-Ilan University went to Jerusalem's Kidron Valley, hoping to save archeological remnants from earth the Waqf (Muslim religious trust) had dug up on the Temple Mount and dumped in the riverbed. A Waqf official noticed the students and began yelling at them. One sentence struck them in particular, they reported: "'You have nothing to look for here, just as the Crusaders had nothing to look for here. Jerusalem is Muslim.'"

In the past, such comments could be seen as the exception. But that changed at the Camp David Conference of June 2002. It was then that senior Israeli officials became aware that the claim that Jews have no real connection to Jerusalem and its holy sites had not only been disseminated and become entrenched in Arab and Muslim communities and part of the public discourse, but had also been adopted by the Palestinian leadership.

Indeed, a new study by Hebrew University's Prof. Yitzhak Reiter, conducted for the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies, states: "In the last generation, the Islamic and Arab history of Jerusalem has gradually been rewritten. At the heart of this new version is the Arabs' historic right to Jerusalem and Palestine. The main argument is that the Arabs ruled Jerusalem thousands of years before the children of Israel [did]. In addition to building the Arab-Muslim case, the Muslim thinkers are formulating a denial and negation of the Jewish-Zionist narrative. Included in that effort is the de-Judaizing of the Temple Mount, the Western Wall and Jerusalem as a whole."

Reiter, who is with the Hebrew University's Truman Institute, is a longtime specialist in the modern history of the Middle East. He reviewed a collection of religious rulings by key muftis in the Muslim world and Internet sites of Islamic movements. He pored over many popular books in Arabic that deal with Jerusalem and sifted through reports and articles on the issue, dating back to 1967. Today he says, "New myths, some of them fictitious and some of them based on facts on the ground, transform the stories about Al-Aqsa into furious struggle."

Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat and Sheikh Raed Salah, like Sheikh Haj Amin al-Husseini, the grand mufti of Jerusalem at the turn of the previous century, and many others, he said, "are using the religious symbols of Jerusalem to enlist the entire Muslim world in its struggle" in several ways.

The Muslims are slowly dropping use of the name given to the Temple Mount complex – Haram al-Sharif – which gave it its status as the third holiest site in Islam, and reverting to exclusive use of the earlier name, Al-Aqsa, which appears in the Qur'an.

Al-Aqsa now refers to the entire Temple Mount complex, including the Western Wall, and not just the mosque. The tradition connecting the three mosques in Mecca, Medina and Al-Aqsa is being used by the Palestinians to exert pressure on Muslim states by saying, as the Palestinian minister of Waqf affairs, Sheikh Yusef Salameh, said in November 2002, "Making a mockery of Al-Aqsa will lead to a mockery of the holy sites in Mecca and Medina because there is a connection between them that must not be broken."

At the same time, there is growing use of the term Al-Aqsa as a symbol and a name for different institutions and organizations, be they Jordanian army journals, Palestinian police units established by the Palestinian Authority in Jericho, Fatah terrorist cells known as the Al-Aqsa Martyrs' Brigade or Internet sites of the northern and southern branches of the Islamic Movement and organizations they have set up and, of course, the current intifadah and the Arab summit convened in its wake.

Contrary to the standard history, in which the Al-Aqsa Mosque was built in the seventh century, in recent years an ancient tradition from the beginning of Islam has been gaining ground. The claim is that the Al-Aqsa Mosque was built 40 years after the construction of the mosque in Mecca by Adam (that is, close to the seven days of creation).

Other traditions that appear in the Waqf administration offices in Jerusalem attribute the building of the mosque to Abraham and Solomon, as Islamic figures, with no connection to Judaism. The former Jordanian minister of Waqf affairs Abed al-Salaam al-Abadi, Sheikh Raed Salah and Islamic Internet sites refer to Abraham as the builder of the Al-Aqsa Mosque 4,000 years ago.

For hundreds of years, Jerusalem has been known in Islam as a sanctified place, first and foremost for having been designated as the place where prayers should be directed (kabila) before Mohammed adopted the Kaaba in Mecca as the kabila. In general, Jerusalem was the direction of prayers for 16 months.

However, now the view that Jerusalem served this purpose for some four years and four months is experiencing a revival. The Palestinian Authority-appointed mufti of Jerusalem, Sheikh Akram Sabri, and Sheikh Yusef Kardawi, the most popular mufti in the Muslim world, who currently lives in Qatar, are only two heralds of this message. The verse in the Qur'an that mentions the Al-Aqsa Mosque, and adds "whose surroundings we have blessed," is meriting an expanded interpretation. The surroundings of Al-Aqsa Mosque are not narrowly defined, as was the case in the past, and they are now providing an opening for the interpretation that Al-Aqsa refers to all of Jerusalem, and most recently, that it refers to all of Palestine.

Members of the Saudi royal family, as well as Sheikh Kardawi, Syrian clerics, Palestinian archeologists such as Dimitri Baramki, and others identify the Jebusites as an ancient Arab tribe that wandered from the Arabian peninsula, together with the Canaanites, around 3,000 BCE, which predated the children of Israel in the land.

But the new history most jarring to the Jewish community is that the First and Second Temple are lies fabricated by the Jews. In public discourse among Arabs, participants regularly add the word "al-maz'um" – that is, the presumptive or fabricated – when referring to the Jewish temples. Mufti Sabri says there are no remnants proving the Jews' claim that there was a temple on the site.

The current Jordanian minister of Waqf affairs, Ahmed Khalil, said last year that Israel is trying to intervene in Al-Aqsa affairs and conduct excavations beneath the mosque in order to build the fabricated temple there.

Arafat Hajazi, a member of the southern branch of the Islamic Movement, asks in an article published in 2002 on the movement's website why the Jews did not build their Temple during the longer than 500-year period between the time it was destroyed a second time by Titus and the period when Abed el-Malik built the Al-Aqsa Mosque. He also notes that hundreds of archeological delegations have conducted excavations in the vicinity of Al-Aqsa and not one of them has found remnants of the Temple.

In another article, which recently appeared on the Internet site of the northern branch of the Islamic Movement, Egyptian archeologist Abed al-Rahim Rihan Barakat, the manager of the archeological site at Dahab in Sinai, writes, "The myth of the fabricated Temple is the greatest crime of historical forgery."

A fatwa on the site of the Waqf in Jerusalem states that David, Solomon and Herod did not build the Temple. Rather, it says, they repaired something that had been there since the time of Adam.

There is a similar campaign of denial with regard to the Western Wall, and it has two aspects: one is the identification of the Western Wall as a sacred place for Muslims because the prophet Mohammed tethered his horse Al-Buraq there and because it is part of the Al-Aqsa Mosque. The other is the argument that the Jews fabricated the Western Wall as a place sacred to them and that they have no historical connection to it. Palestinian and Egyptian religious authorities have issued fatwas to that effect.

"Al-Aqsa is in danger" continues to be the motto of articles by Muslim figures and the focus of mass rallies organized each year by the northern branch of the Islamic Movement in Israel.

"The most far-flung Muslim communities hear the stories about the Palestinian struggle over their sacred site, and through the political tale, the revised religious traditions are also internalized," Reiter says.

"The fact that Israel's official policy – as embodied in the decisions of the Chief Rabbinate Council, the government and the High Court of Justice – leaves the administration of the Temple Mount in the hands of the Muslim Waqf is not recognized in the contemporary Muslim world.

On the contrary, "the activities of extremist Jewish entities, some of them minuscule, to revive the [First] Temple ritual is perceived and disseminated by Palestinian sources as if it is a reflection of official policy," Reiter says.

Reiter's work was delivered as a position paper to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs and was discussed recently at a seminar at the Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies. Two main conclusions emerged from the discussion. One is that Jerusalem, today more than in the past, is a pan-Muslim Arab issue, and therefore a decision about it cannot be made by the Palestinians alone. Secondly, any Arab official seeking to work out an arrangement for Jerusalem and the holy sites is constrained by the Islamic religious world and thus, as a negotiator, has little room to manoeuvre.

Drafting kids to die

It has taken the fortitude of clinical psychologist Marty McKay to bring to Canadian public attention an aspect of the Khadr file that might otherwise have been ignored. We'll remember, of course, that Maha Elsamnah Khadr is the matriarch of a family that has actively promoted the jihadist madness of Osama bin Laden for many years. Moreover, this same woman has brazenly encouraged her children to volunteer for suicide missions on behalf of the Islamic cause. But, after returning to Canada to seek medical help for her son, Karim, she is likely going to get more than she bargained for. It now seems probable that, largely due to McKay's instigation, the Children's Aid Society will be after her to determine whether her actions, and those of her family, meet the criteria for child abuse.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

It is likely they do.

And inasmuch as the Khadr story has sensitized Canadians to a particular case within a local context, it also speaks to a much more serious, and increasingly tragic, phenomenon – that of the enticement of children into armies and militias in general. It has been estimated, in fact, that hundreds of thousands of so-called "child soldiers," many as young as 10 years old, and some even younger, are engaged in combat of the most horrific sort in ragtag units around the globe. The problem is most acute in Africa and Asia, but prevalent, as well, in several of the trouble spots of Europe, Central America and the Middle East.

The motives for deliberately sending children into danger, and in many instances to certain death, differ by region and by the nature of particular conflicts. However, what occurs under the umbrella of the Palestinian Authority must rank among the most sophisticated and cold-blooded indoctrination processes of any regime that lures children to its ranks. An ethos of violence, a glorification of martyrdom and a hatred for Israel are known to take root at a very early stage in the "education" of young Palestinians. Why should it, therefore, be surprising that we are seeing an apparent drop in the age of children who have been successfully recruited for shahada (martyrdom)?

While PA leaders and their counterparts in Hamas and Islamic Jihad have always insisted that they do not sanction the exploitation of children as "human shields" or suicide bombers, mounting evidence to the contrary is undeniable.

It is way past time for the international community to rouse from its stupor and do whatever is necessary to make PA President Yasser Arafat and his cronies accountable for one of the more egregious of all crimes: the callous abuse and shameless murder of their own children.

Businessman confronts one of Israel's national failures

A few weeks ago, the father of a close friend of mine in Canada spent a busy six days in Israel. He was no ordinary visitor. A spry 94-year-old retired businessman, Irwin Green is an impressive figure.

But far more than his age sets him apart.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Originally from Detroit but now living in Florida, Irwin is a regular traveler to Israel. This was his third trip in the past year-and-a-half.

Each time it's been for the same purpose – to help make Israel a better place by making it a more just country.

Irwin does not believe in coercion, but his actions invariably force Israelis to face an issue most have traditionally ignored, to Israel's detriment.

"Aside from the moral issues involved, Israel is losing a great deal by not utilizing and better integrating 20 per cent of its population," says Irwin. "There must be equality for all citizens in Israel. Israeli Arabs are very much second-class citizens in their own country."

Jewish Arab relations in Israel is an issue that has become increasingly dear to Irwin. He's committed to improving the situation and puts his money where his mouth is. In recent years, he's contributed more than $2 million to projects aimed at nurturing Jewish Arab coexistence and greater equality for Israel's Arab minority. But more than just signing checks, Irwin gets actively involved in helping develop each endeavor.

During his visit to Israel last month, Irwin helped inaugurate a new soccer stadium he funded in Nazareth Illit that will be used by local Jewish and Arab youth. Accompanied by his son Don who lives in Toronto, Irwin took part in a special ceremony involving 1,200 teenagers and local dignitaries.

In his address to the crowd, which included several hundred members of a Michigan solidarity mission, Irwin said that it is a new challenge for Jews to be in the majority in a country after being in the minority for thousands of years.

Irwin also visited a child development centre he funded in neighbouring Nazareth, the largest Arab city in Israel. During the construction of the three-storey building that is nearly complete, Irwin used fax, e-mail and phone to work closely with Mayor Ramez Jaraisy and the Arab builders to oversee the project. This summer, Irwin plans to return to Israel for the inauguration of the centre, which will provide services for both Jewish and Arab children in the region.

At the cornerstone laying ceremony in 2002, Irwin and his son Don, co-founder of the Roots clothing company, arranged a public reconciliation between Menachem Ariav, the Jewish mayor of Nazareth Illit and Jaraisy, his Arab counterpart in Nazareth. Until then, the two had been locked in a bitter dispute and had refused to speak to each other since Arab rioting erupted in the area two years earlier.

A prolific reader of newspapers, Irwin is better informed about current affairs in the Middle East than many Israelis. When in Israel, which he has visited 15 times since his first trip in 1956, he likes nothing better than to engage people in intense discussions about the state of the nation.

It disturbs Irwin that while the country's Arabs enjoy full civil and political rights, they suffer from major economic and social gaps in the levels of state development accorded to the Jewish and Arab sectors. He often speaks of the disparities in government funding in public health, education, welfare and infrastructure.

Earlier this month, the Central Bureau of Statistics released new figures showing that Israeli Arabs are much poorer than their Jewish compatriots. As well, the data indicated that eight out of every 1,000 babies born to Israeli Arab mothers die, double the number among Jews.

It was but the latest illustration of the disadvantaged state of Israel's Arab minority and the failure of the Jewish majority to remedy a decades-old situation. It one of Israel's greatest national failures, one no less significant than the failure to make peace with the Palestinians.

"We Jews often consider ourselves guardians of what is right," says Irwin. "Not only is it right for Israel to improve the status of its Arab citizens, Israel stands to gain on many levels."

Irwin is trying to make that happen. Long may he thrive and make many more return visits to Israel.

EU and UN trying to hijack disengagement

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's unilateral disengagement proposal is far more popular in Washington and Brussels than among the activists in his own party. U.S. President George W. Bush has heaped praise on this brave and bold decision, promising U.S. diplomatic and other assistance. And the so-called Middle East Quartet – which includes the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia – has endorsed the plan as an important step on the road to peace. These words were welcomed by many of the Israelis who enthusiastically endorse separation, in strong contrast to the 60,000 members of the Likud Party who voted against the plan.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

But past experience has shown that when the UN and Brussels agree with Israel and the Americans, something is not quite right. Europe – led by France – has opposed Washington's Middle East peace efforts since 1967 and is not about to get religion.

The gap is huge – American policy is based on sympathy for Israel as a fellow democracy under threat, but Europe (supported by the oil-rich Arab countries) starts with misplaced empathy for the Palestinian "victims." For decades, Europe has promoted the myth that the creation of a Palestinian state, ostensibly next to Israel and not in place of it, will bring peace. The Americans are more realistic, declaring that Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and fellow terrorists must be replaced by a new leadership, while Europe continues to pay homage to the "President of Palestine."

Given this history, it would be surprising if Europe backed any policy presented by Sharon and Bush. And indeed, beyond the headlines, there is little agreement on unilateral disengagement. The plan that Europe and the UN are promoting is, in many ways, the direct opposite of the one favoured by Israel and the United States.

Under Sharon's approach, Israel will choose where and when to draw the lines, based on security and demographic principles, and not on UN resolutions written by the anti-Israel club. Furthermore, Israel will maintain full security control over Gaza to prevent the Palestinians from importing missiles and explosives. The purpose of unilateral disengagement is to manage the conflict, because, as both Sharon and Bush understand, there is no realistic way to reach a serious agreement in this generation.

But European governments, working closely with United Nations "humanitarian aid" agencies and powerful non-governmental organizations, have prepared an action plan that attempts to impose their version of peace. Under a plan developed by Terje Roed-Larsen, one of the Norwegians responsible for the Oslo catastrophe, this international presence would have air and sea access, meaning that Palestinians working under UN protection (such as the UNRWA relief organization) could resume smuggling weapons via air and sea ports. Of course, this would be officially forbidden, as it was under the 1993 Oslo "peace" accords, but in practice, neither Europe nor the UN have any ability to enforce such promises. And since the Europeans and the UN view the Palestinians as victims, regardless of wars and terrorism, Israeli security requirements are ignored in Larsen's plan.

On another critical dimension, Sharon and most Israelis support unilateral disengagement (except the Likud activists who voted no, and other opponents) as an alternative to international plans that would create a failed Palestinian state under Arafat's violent and corrupt rule. In contrast, Europe and the UN hope to use disengagement and the removal of settlements as the first steps towards precisely this outcome. For them, the main framework for peace is the post-Oslo "road map" plan – which was forced on Washington just before the Iraq war in the attempt to appease the Arabs.

If an Israeli withdrawal from Gaza and isolated settlements near Jenin ends up giving birth to Arafat's Palestinian state and forcing Israel to return to the 1949 ceasefire lines, there is no sense in beginning. Despite the apparent logic of unilateral disengagement and the reduction in daily friction, if Europe and the UN are allowed to hijack disengagement, this plan will never get off the ground.

Jerusalem: a partitioned city for centuries

Ever since Israel wrested the eastern half of Jerusalem from Jordan in the 1967 Six Day War, the dogma spouted by Israeli politicians has been that Jerusalem is Israel's "undivided" capital.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

To be sure, Jerusalem is Israel's capital city. Yet, in practice, Jerusalem – conquered and reconquered no less than 38 times since its founding – is the world's most divided metropolis.

"Jerusalem," American novelist Herman Melville wrote in 1860 after a visit, "is besieged by an army of the dead."

One hundred and forty four years after he penned these lines, Jerusalem, alas, is deeply split along religious, ethnic and national lines.

Jerusalem's Jewish and Arab inhabitants live and pray in different neighbourhoods and houses of worship. They speak different languages and attend different schools. They read and watch different newspapers and television shows.

In other words, they live parallel but separate lives.

No matter how hard Israelis strain to perpetuate the myth that Jerusalem is indivisible, the facts on the ground suggest otherwise, and they cannot be altered unless Israel and the Palestinians reach a comprehensive agreement, which seems plainly out of sight at this particular juncture.

Jerusalem, nonetheless, is central to Judaism: as the site of the First and Second temples, as the capital of ancient Israel's monarchy, and as the subject of perennial lamentation.

Jews face toward Jerusalem when they pray, and biblical literature and Jewish law and folklore celebrate Jerusalem's glory and mourn its devastation.

In short, Jerusalem is the repository of Jewish messianic hopes.

Although Muslims ruled Jerusalem for hundreds of years and are clearly attached to it, Jerusalem never acquired an exclusively Islamic character, nor was it ever considered an Arab capital.

Yet, paradoxically, as British scholar Bernard Wasserstein points out in Divided Jerusalem (Yale University Press), his terrific, dispassionate history of the city, early Zionist thinkers generally avoided attributing special importance to Jerusalem.

Achad Ha-am, having been repelled by his first encounter with the Jews of Jerusalem, chose to settle in Tel Aviv.

Theodor Herzl was shocked by Jerusalem's filth.

Arthur Ruppin established the Zionist Organization's first Palestine Office in Jaffa.

From the 1880s onward, Jewish settlers looked down on Jerusalem, appalled by its squalor and obscurantism.

Even some Hebrew writers, such as Yosef Haim Brenner and Nathan Alterman, demystified it.

The division of Jerusalem into four residential quarters – Jewish, Muslim, Christian and Armenian – had its origins during the Mamluk period, and was driven by each group's respective desire to settle around their most important holy places and shrines.

Alongside this factor, the splintering of Jerusalem was a function of external pressures, the jockeying of great powers – the Ottoman Turks, Britain, Russia and France – to gain a controlling foothold within its storied walls. Jerusalem was captured by the Ottoman Turks in 1516, and remained in their hands, as a political backwater, for the next 400 odd years.

Contrary to the claims of contemporary Arab propagandists who wish to de-link Jerusalem from Jewish history, Jews formed the majority of its residents by the 1880s.

By 1914, the outbreak of World War I, which would transform the region, Jerusalem was home to 45,000 Jews out of a total population of 70,000. Palestine was then inhabited by 85,000 Jews, compared to some 700,000 Muslims and Christians.

Foreign funds – in particular Jewish and Christian – and the general growth of security accounted for the geographical expansion of Jerusalem in the late 19th century.

However, few Zionist newcomers settled in Jerusalem, preferring to live on the coastal plain. In fact, many secular Zionists equated Jerusalem with all that they considered backward-looking in Judaism.

The British army, commanded by Gen. Edmund Allenby, marched into Jerusalem in 1917, setting the stage for Britain's League of Nations mandate, the first Christian administration of the city since the Crusades.

Under the British, Jerusalem was transformed, and politically for the first time in its modern history, it became a capital in name and spirit.

Britain took extraordinary care to curry favour with all religious groups, but it was not long before the first major outbreak of sectarian violence erupted in Jerusalem.

In April 1920, the Muslim religious festival of Nebi Musa deteriorated into a political demonstration in which five Jews and four Arabs were killed.

The riot, Wasserstein notes, had two far-reaching consequences.

The Arab mayor, a nationalist from the Husseini clan, was dismissed and replaced by a moderate Arab dignitary from the rival Nashashibi family. This development would define local Arab politics for decades to come.

Subsequently, Sir Herbert Samuel, the British high commissioner, appointed Hajj Amin al-Husseini as Grand Mufti of Jerusalem. He turned out to be a radical Arab nationalist who exacerbated Jerusalem's existing fissures.

As Arab-Jewish tension in Palestine intensified in the 1930s, Chaim Arlosoroff, the head of the Jewish Agency's political department, suggested that Jerusalem be divided into Arab and Jewish boroughs.

The British demurred, claiming the proposal would increase friction.

In 1937, when the centre of Jewish gravity in Palestine had moved decisively to Tel Aviv, the Zionist leadership proposed partition in Jerusalem.

The logic was clear.

If Jews were to gain an unassailable grip in Jerusalem, which was voluntarily segregated and coveted by Muslims and Christians alike, the city would have to be formally divided.

A Jerusalem committee, created by the Zionist Executive, therefore proposed that Jewish-inhabited western and northern districts of the city, together with Mount Scopus, be included in a Jewish state.

The upshot: the 1938 Woodhead Commission rejected partition on practical grounds.

In 1947, the United Nations Special Committee on Palestine recommended, in effect, that Jerusalem be internationalized.

The UN's Palestine partition plan echoed this recommendation. And although the scheme was stillborn, the British, on the eve of their 1948 withdrawal from Palestine, took steps toward facilitating Jerusalem's partition.

The War of Independence formalized the partition of Jerusalem into eastern and western districts.

Strangely enough, Israel's first president, Chaim Weizmann – the man who brought the 1917 Balfour Declaration to fruition – established his official residence in Rehovot.

The postwar ceasefire in Jerusalem was generally observed, but sniper fire was a perpetual hazard.

Within three weeks of the Six Day War, Israel removed most of the physical obstacles – barbed wire entanglements, fortified emplacements and minefields – to expedite movement between east and west.

Having annexed the eastern portion, Israel expanded the city's area from 13,000 to 28,000 acres.

As Teddy Kollek, the mayor, paved new roads and meshed utility services and bus routes, the Israeli government expropriated Arab-owned lands in eastern Jerusalem to make way for what would eventually become 11 new Jewish neighbourhoods.

The walls of eastern Jerusalem

Palestinian Arabs in Jerusalem have staunchly resisted integration into Israel, and not surprisingly, Jerusalem has been a bone in the throat of a series of negotiations, from 1978 onward, to defuse the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Being of the view that Israel cannot exercise long-term sovereignty over the city's Arab areas, Wasserstein believes that Jerusalem should be partitioned.

Yet, as the 2000 Camp David talks showed beyond any doubt, a solution in Jerusalem is far off.

Even U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell, in a major speech on the Arab-Israeli conflict three years ago, stayed clear of this inflammatory issue.

It seems clear that Jerusalem will be a contentious issue for years to come.

Grandmother reveals the secret of 105 lb. weight loss

With a name like Pat, which rhymes with FAT, I was the brunt of cruel jokes. I went on every crazy weight loss scheme. Tried the grapefruit, egg, special soup, all protein, all vegetable, only starch, high fiber and all fruit diets. Spent a fortune on tasteless prepackaged food. Went to support groups. Starved on diet shakes. I'd lose weight, then gain it back plus more. I was ashamed.

I was amazed by the change after my first hypnosis session. My brain got the message to zap my appetite. My cravings came to a dead stop. My fat melted off at an average of 3.5 pounds a week. I have never felt better, emotionally and physically.

Call now to schedule your free weight loss consultation. It won't cost you one penny to find out if hypnosis is for you. You'll get no high-pressure sales talk. Just low rates, excellent service and a program that works.

The costs of full-time Torah study

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

One of the more controversial issues that currently confronts Jewish education are the economics of full-time Torah study. The phenomenon of learning Torah without any other form of gainful employment into one's late 20s, not to mention 30s and 40s, is rather unprecedented in Jewish history, as many of the greatest Torah minds of the past supported themselves in some fashion.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

I heard a story recently about a young man who had spent a number of years after high school involved in full-time learning and was advised by the head of his yeshiva that he should not go to university – or any other post-secondary institution – under any circumstances. The parent of this child, an Orthodox professional, while fully supportive and even proud of his son's learning, nevertheless had grave concerns about the child's economic future. Upon expressing these concerns to his son's rosh yeshiva, he was advised that "God would help." The father took this as not simply a reference to divine providence, but also as a veiled allusion to his own responsibility to permanently support – in a financial sense – his son's learning.

The ethic of totally committed and family/community supported Torah study has its vigorous adherents who argue, not without cause, that in a Jewish world decimated by secularism, the Shoah and assimilation, there is an overriding need to cultivate an elite who are devoted to pure Torah study, and that university is verboten. (Of course, this is not the philosophy of all yeshivot). The biblical model of the tribes Yissachar and Zvulun are mentioned as the paradigm of those in the working community gaining merit by supporting those who are involved in continuous study.

The question of who picks up the tab for this ideal, however, is a much thornier problem. What happens, as recent trends indicate, when the flow of parental or philanthropic funding dries up? With what vocational skills will these young scholars be able to enter the workforce?

And what is the effect on the spouses of these yeshiva students, who may be expected to work at least part-time to help defer expenses? Jonathan Rosenblum, an articulate haredi columnist living in Israel, noted that "wives are overwhelmed by the burden of being the main financial support," while at the same time raising a growing family. Psychological professionals who deal with such families have noted enormous and increasing stress on the woman in her quest to master these multiple roles.

Finally, what about many students in yeshivot, in high school and beyond, who are, in fact, floundering under the burden of having to be Talmudic learners 12 hours a day, and have neither the intellectual facility nor the emotional temperament for that kind of education, but persist out of peer pressure and fear of not fitting into the system?

In light of these serious issues, I can empathize with the father mentioned above and his frustration with his son's spiritual leader.

Some young people may be the Torah giants of tomorrow, but many others are ill-served by being in such programs. In all cases, it will require wisdom and sophistication, and not platitudes, to properly negotiate the difficulties of this complex problem.

Book sheds light on 'new anti-Semitism'

Those Who Forget the Past: The Question of Anti-Semitism*, edited by Ron Rosenbaum, Random House $24.95 (paperbound).

Books
Bernard Baskin

The basic premise of this invaluable anthology is clear and unmistakable. The widespread belief that the 21st century would usher in universal peace and understanding proved to be illusory and simplistic. Actually, in the context of a media-saturated and globalized village, anti-Semitism has recharged its battery with a vengeance. In the Islamic world – and increasingly in western Europe – it has become a malignant form of autointoxication.

Most good-hearted and rational persons refused to believe that anti-Semitism could, once again, become a serious problem. They were wrong. This is an egregious error that must not be repeated in our time.

Edited by Ron Rosenbaum, author of Explaining Hitler, and with an afterward by the redoubtable Cynthia Ozick, Those Who Forget the Past brings together some 60 distinguished writers and intellectuals to discuss the origin and nature of the new anti-Semitism.

They grapple with difficult and salient questions: Is a second Holocaust possible? Is the half-century Israeli experiment a failure? Do atomic weapons pose a threat to Israel's existence? Can Islam ever reconcile itself to the existence of a Jewish state? How are fantastic anti-Semitic conspiracy theories created and spread in the Arab world? Why do college campuses seethe with anti-Jewish calumny and violence? To what extent is religion the basis for anti-Semitism? What can we learn from the murder of Daniel Pearl? And so on.

Thanks to Europe's welcoming immigration policies and to their own high fertility, Muslims are now a significant demographic factor on the continent. If in 1945 they numbered fewer than a million, today they are more than 15 million, with some two million in England, more than 4½ million in France, three million in Germany, nearly a million apiece in Italy, Spain and Holland, and the remainder scattered across more than a dozen other countries.

They are, of course, a heterogeneous population, and most of them are no doubt neither in the grip of radical Islam nor susceptible to appeals to violence. But some significant number of them are, and the challenge they pose can only grow.

Hallucinatory fantasy is common in Arab countries. In Saudi Arabia, for example, a government-controlled newspaper excites its readers with a story of the Jewish use of the blood of gentile adolescents, not for Passover matzah, but for Purim pastry. The victim is placed in a needle-studded barrel, the story says. "These needles do the job and the victim's blood drips from him very slowly. Thus, the victim suffers dreadful torment – torment that affords the Jewish vampires great delight as they carefully monitor every detail of the blood-shedding with pleasure and love that are difficult to comprehend."

Holocaust denial, central to Arab anti-Semitism, helps to forge a strategic alliance with Europe, which waited more than half a century for a way to blame the Jews for their own destruction. So instead of sounding the alarm over genocidal Islamist Jew-hatred, many Europeans have eagerly embraced the Nazification of the Jews.

This has nothing to do with legitimate criticism of Israel and everything to do with delegitimizing the Jewish state altogether in readiness for its dismantling.

Harold Evans, former editor of the London Sunday Times, is astonished at how frenzied, vociferous, paranoid, vicious and prolific the new anti-Semitism is, and how little this fact has been reported, analyzed and commented on in the West by press, academia, church and governments.

"A single skinhead assault on a synagogue in Europe is news," Evans says, "but not the unremitting daily assault on Jews waged from Morocco to Cairo to Damascus, from Baghdad to Teheran, the Gaza Strip to Karachi. The media in the Middle East is an open sewer."

The story of 20th-century Europe before World War II, wrote the historian Norman Cohen is a story of how a "grossly delusional view of the world, based on infantile fears and hatreds, was able to find expression in murder and torture beyond all imagining. It is a case history in collective psychopathology, and its deepest implications reach far beyond anti-Semitism and the fate of the Jews." Those words remain frighteningly relevant today.

Those Who Forget the Past is an outstanding, many-sided, insightful contribution to our understanding of an ancient disease which is growing virulently in our time.

Something other than blintzes

Unlike other holidays in the Jewish calendar, only one festival, Shavuot, has become synonymous with dairy foods. And not just with any dairy foods, but those ubiquitous blintzes and cheesecakes. If your bubbie gave you her beloved blintz or cheesecake recipe, enjoy it, gezunterheit! But today we're going to take a breather and look at some other marvelous traditional and contemporary Shavuot dairy dishes.

Before we get to the recipes, a word about the holiday. Shavuot is best known for the giving of the Torah. So why the association with dairy foods? Two of the most famous reasons on Virtual Jerusalem's list [http://209.58.241.78/vjholidays/shavuot/dairy.htm] are: On Shavuot, the Jewish people received a new code of law, including the dietary restrictions that became part of their daily life. To avoid transgressing the new, unfamiliar laws of separating meat and milk, they ate only dairy products on the holiday. Another reason: The Torah is compared to milk, as it is written: "Sweetness drops/ From your lips, O bride; Honey and milk/ Are under your tongue" (Song of Songs, 4:11) [www.hareidi.org/ref/Song_of_Songs4.htm].

For those who like their food with a dash of mysticism, Lesli Koppelman Ross provides sources in kabbalah that tie the numerical value of milk, chalav, which is 40, to the number of days Moses spent on Mount Sinai receiving the Ten Commandments [http://tiny url.com/3534u].

If you're looking to expand your Shavuot repertoire, visit the RFJC Recipe Archives [http://tinyurl.com/2cyn7]. How does a Minty Cucumber Soup followed by an Artichoke-Spinach Casserole or Carrot Vichyssoise with Orange Nectar sound? You can find those and more than 100 other Shavuot recipes at RFCJ. And when you're done with those, go to the Jewish Food Mailing List Archives, with its separate sections for Shavuot savouries (including Cheese-Lox Casserole, Crostini with Gorgonzola and Honey) and sweets (Cappuccino Phyllo Cups and Sugarfree Cherry Noodle Kugel) [http://tinyurl.com/24owf].

Author Claudia Roden recommends Sephardi foods such as Les Fila au Fromage, small cheese triangles or cigars. "These ever-so-light little pies, also known as filikas, ojaldres and feuilletes, were always among the most popular items on the buffet and tea tables of Oriental Jews." Roden fills them with Edam, Gouda, cheddar, cottage cheese and butter. Fortunately, her Muhallabeya sounds like it may be a bit gentler on the waistline. The milk pudding (known as "sutlage" in Turkey and the Balkans) is "the all-purpose dessert of the dairy table and the traditional sweet of Shavuot and Purim." It calls for rice flour, cold milk, sugar and a mixture of flavourings and garnishes [www.jhom.com/calendar/sivan/recipes.htm]. For other Sephardi dishes, visit the Jewish Heritage Online Magazine, which looks at Shavuot food traditions around the world, including a Sephardi seven-layer cake called Siete Cielos (Seven Heavens), symbolic of the seven celestial spheres God traversed to present the Torah to Moses on Mount Sinai [www.jhom.com/calendar/sivan/dairy.htm].

For something non-traditional, Israeli food writer Daniel Rogov consulted with three Israeli chefs who created entrées with Mediterranean ingredients: Eggplant and Vegetable Tart with Bulgarian Cheese, Cheese-filled Raviolis with Tomato Sauce and Tart of Mushrooms and Goat's Cheese [http://tinyurl.com/2e4qv].

If you love dairy food and have been to Israel, then you've probably sampled Labane, a salty and sour cheese that calls for regular or goat's milk. The Jewish Reconstructionist Federation's Shavuot website says making Labane "is a lot of work but is definitely worth it." The milk must be properly heated, cooled, strained and then filled into a cotton cloth, which is suspended over a pail for 10-12 hours [www.jrf.org/israel/shavuot-action.html].

If you are lactose intolerant, don't despair. Most of these sites provide pareve recipe alternatives.

I know I said this would be a blintz and cheesecake-free column. But I think that doesn't preclude e-mailing a Shavuot greeting card with a photo of a virtual cheesecake or a virtual blintz. Or if you prefer, you can always send your friends virtual bourekas [http://209.58.241.78/vjholidays/shavuot/cheesecake.htm].

Have a very happy holiday.

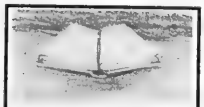
Commandments to live by

On Shavuot, in celebration of the giving of the Torah at Mount Sinai, we read the Ten Commandments. It's said that the Ten Commandments are the basis of our society, the law from which all other laws derive. Therefore they've been given careful scrutiny over the ages and have also been the subject of ample parody.



Rabbinic Reflections

Arthur Hugh Clough of Victorian England wrote The Latest Decalogue, which was both a take-off on the Ten Commandments and a commentary on the petit bourgeois mentality of England during his lifetime:

Thou shalt have one God only; who
Would be at the expense of two?
No graven images may be
Worshipped, except the currency.
Swear not at all; for, for thy curse
Thine enemy is none the worse.
At church on Sunday to attend
Will serve to keep the world thy friend.
Honour thy parents; that is, all
From whom advancement may befall.
Thou shalt not kill, but need'st not strive
Officiously to keep alive.
Do not adultery commit;
Advantage rarely comes of it.
Thou shalt not steal; an empty feat,
When it's so lucrative to cheat.
Bear not false witness; let the lie
Have time on its own wings to fly.
Thou shalt not covet, but tradition
Approves all forms of competition.

Might we not venture to posit a few serious commandments for our own age? How about, "Thou shalt not expect it all right now." From one-hour solutions on television dramas to stock market inside traders, one symptom of life today is to want it all right now. Yet, to arrive at Shavuot, we must count day by day from the outset of Pesach, as the Omer reminds us that Mount Sinai did not appear instantly on the horizon, and the march to Eretz Yisrael would take another 40 years. There's plenty wrong with our world, but there may not be a quick fix. Maybe we need to remember this: "Thou shalt not expect it all now."

Another commandment for our time might be, "Thou shalt not expect too much." Don't be a chazzer – we mustn't be piggish. There's such a thing as an expectation that's too high.

Exam season approaches in our high schools. Parents who expect great grades from their children may relentlessly pressure them to attain beyond their capabilities. Children, too, may want an entire season at summer camp or to wear only this summer's designer labels, though their parents' pocketbooks cannot match such expectations. The ancient sacrifices once required 10 per cent (and more) of each Jew's yield. It reminded us that one who receives 90 per cent of expectations is doing just fine. We mustn't be chazzers.

One other modern commandment might be Hillel's old dictum, "Do not separate yourself from the community." Contemporary values atomize society by emphasizing the individual. Individual rights are the positive side of the coin, but the philosophy of everyone for him- or herself is the negative side. Jews believe in having a minyan – a minimum number, a quorum – to make up a congregation. We cannot survive and do our work as a Jewish group, we cannot sing in chorus the song that is uniquely ours, if everyone calls their own tune.

Shavuot, a major holiday too much observed in the breach by contemporary Jews, shows us that the sense of community in Jewish religious life is at stake. Let us not separate ourselves from the community, beginning with coming to synagogue to hear the Ten Commandments call us to right living.

Former MK favours withdrawal to pre-'67 borders

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A just and workable two-state solution can only be achieved if Israel withdraws to its pre-1967 borders with minor territorial adjustments, a former Knesset member said during a recent trip to Toronto.

Naomi Chazan, of the left-of-centre Meretz party, contends that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's unilateral plan to pull out of the Gaza Strip and four settlements in the West Bank – which the Likud party soundly rejected last week in a referendum – envisages a truncated rather than a viable Palestinian state.

Delivering the third annual Charles and Andrea Bronfman Lecture in Israeli Studies at the University of Toronto, Chazan said that if Sharon's plan is fully implemented, Israel will retain settlement clusters in the West Bank and the prospect of a viable, contiguous Palestinian state will be seriously eroded.

The alternative to a two-state solution is a one-state solution, which would fundamentally alter Israel's Jewish character, she warned.

Chazan, who was an MK from 1992 to 2003, believes that support for a viable two-state solution has coalesced in Israel, the region and abroad.

Speaking of Israel's 37-year occupation, she said, "We can't control another people against their will. It's immoral and it's killing us."

Chazan speculated that Sharon has no intention of relinquishing the bulk of the West Bank.

And so "Gaza first" may yet morph into "Gaza alone," she said.

Under this scenario, Sharon would fortify existing settlements in the West Bank and finish the security fence jutting into Judea and Samaria.

Chazan urged Sharon to launch bilateral negotiations with the Palestinians, construct the fence strictly along the Green Line and not to strengthen the settlements.

> 'We can't control another people against their will'

Scoffing at Sharon's claim that Israel has no one to talk to on the Palestinian side, she said, "It's self-defeating to assume we don't have a partner. I've been working for years with moderate Palestinians, and I can name names."

By definition, she added, Israel should negotiate with its enemies. Failure to do so will cause further violence.

She acknowledged that Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, is no Nelson Mandela – the first black president of post-apartheid South Africa.

But neither is Sharon an F.W. DeKlerk, she asserted, referring to the last white president of South Africa who paved the way for the end of apartheid and the introduction of multiracial rule.

Accusing the current Israeli government of consistently having undermined the Palestinian Authority and delegitimized Palestinian leaders, Chazan accused Sharon of failing to cultivate the first and the present Palestinian prime ministers.

Currently a fellow at the Center for International Studies at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology in Boston, she described the status quo in the territories as untenable and unacceptable. "Everyone is suffering. We can't continue on the present path."

But she acknowledged that the breakdown of mutual trust between Israel and the Palestinians is so entrenched that it has become a debilitating feature of the conflict.

Blasting Sharon's lack of sincerity, Chazan said he continually affirms his commitment to the internationally sponsored "road map" peace plan, but actually undermines it by refusing to negotiate with the Palestinians and by pressing ahead with the Gaza plan.

Chazan warned that if the United States sticks by Sharon's plan, Washington will no longer be regarded as an honest broker in the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Her criticism of the plan notwithstanding, Chazan admitted it is a "brilliant and masterful" manoeuvre.

It isolates the Israeli far-right and blurs differences between the Likud and the Labor parties.

And by virtue of the fact that the Likud bloc and the Labor party are converging, Sharon's moves set the stage for a fundamental realignment of domestic politics in Israel, said Chazan, who is also a professor of political science at Hebrew University.

In a back-handed compliment, she said the plan contains two elements the peace camp has always promoted: a withdrawal from occupied territories and the dismantling of settlements.

"It starts what the left wanted," she observed, saying the concept of unilateral separation from the Palestinians was conceived by the Labor party.

With Sharon having decided to pull out of Gaza, Israel has reached the most critical juncture in the Arab-Israeli dispute since the 1967 Six Day War, and possibly since the 1948 War of Independence, she said.

Chazan predicted that Sharon will go ahead with the plan, despite the results of the May 2 referendum. She spoke before it took place.

Whatever happens, the plan will change the shape of the Middle East and the Arab-Israeli conflict, Chazan said.

In reply to a question, she noted the Camp David summit of July 2000 should not have taken place due to improper preparations.

Even if Arafat had accepted Israel's ideas, the Knesset would have rejected them. Ehud Barak, then Israel's prime minister, had already lost his parliamentary majority, Chazan pointed out.

Oakville teen selected for Reform program

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

When Zach Newburgh was younger, he would go to synagogue because his parents Marc and Cheryl, wanted him to. As he got older, though, the Oakville teen developed a genuine interest in Judaism.

Zach Newburgh

Earlier this year, the Grade 9 student at Iroquois Ridge High School was the only Canadian among 12 students selected for the Union for Reform Judaism's Meitav Youth Fellowship, a three-year program of Jewish learning and leadership training. The program begins next month with a stint at the Reform movement's Camp Swig in northern California. Newburgh will join the other Meitav fellows there and spend three hours a day studying Hebrew in preparation for a semester of study in Israel in Grade 11. Later in the summer, he will return to the Reform movement's Camp George in Ontario for his sixth year there.

To qualify for the leadership program, Newburgh had to be nominated by his rabbi.

"He's a very bright, motivated person with a lot of great skills already," said Rabbi Paul Sidlofsky, spiritual leader of Oakville's Shaarei Beth El Congregation, the only synagogue in Halton Region with approximately 130 families. "I was very happy to nominate him."

Over the past year, Newburgh has become active in the temple youth group, serving as its communications vice-president and prompting the group's adviser Seth Winberg, to suggest that he would be a good candidate for the fellowships. He still attends congregational school and also organized a Sunday morning minyan that ran about half a dozen times, inspired by an Orthodox minyan he attended with his grandfather in Baltimore on his 13th birthday

"I loved the closeness of the minyan," said Newburgh, who lived in New York until he was five. "I put tfillin on for the first time, and I was just wowed." For about a year after that, he attended Thursday morning minyan at Hamilton's Beth Jacob Congregation, a Conservative synagogue about 25 minutes by car from his home. His mother Cheryl, would make a special trip to drive him there every week before school.

In recent years Newburgh has found there's a lot that's "awesome" in Judaism. When he first learned about Gematria, for example – the system that assigns number values to Hebrew letters – he found it fascinating.

At first Newburgh started taking his Judaism more seriously because he thought it would be "cool" to be a little different from his mostly non-Jewish peers. Of 1,000 students at his school, he figures there are barely half a dozen who are Jewish.

Although he has experienced the occasional anti-Semitic incident in the public school system, he said it was not tolerated by the administration and was dealt with.

His friends, who have attended the occasional family seder and Shabbat service over the years, are very supportive of his Jewish involvement. "They think it's awesome," he said.

In fact, Newburgh, an honours student who enjoys playing basketball and guitar, is thinking about becoming a rabbi when he is older, although he is also considering a career in law.

For now, though, he is looking forward to the fellowship. "It's a great opportunity for me to learn about Judaism." He's been in touch with the other participants by e-mail, and feels they are going to become close friends.

Newburgh is somewhat apprehensive about going to Israel for the first time, but, he said, "I also can't wait. You can't just be scared your whole life. It's always going to be scary."

YOM HASIDUR: Associated Hebrew Schools Grade 1 students recently celebrated Yom Hasidur. The children prepared all year for this special ceremony where they lead the morning prayer service and received their own beautifully covered prayer books, which they will use through the rest of their school years.

Hana's Suitcase becomes real for 500 Ontario students

By ROCHELLE KAHN
UJA Federation

It might be hard to reconcile the Holocaust with anything uplifting but, for the 500 students participating in the 24th Annual Senior Student Conference on the Holocaust, the day's ultimate message was all about hope and strength. As Grade 10 and 11 students from Toronto's Branksome Hall explained, "if we all work together, of course we can change the world. But we have to step up, speak up, respect and appreciate what we have. We can't hate; look what it leads to."

Powerful messages from young voices, but the students spoke in unison, after a riveting presentation by Karen Levine, author of the award-winning book and radio documentary, Hana's Suitcase, and subsequent discussions with a number of Holocaust survivors, including Hana's brother, George Brady.

Hana's Suitcase is the true story of how a determined museum curator in Tokyo searched the world to connect a suitcase from 1930s Germany to George Brady in Toronto. The suitcase, painted with the words Hana Brady, May 16, 1931 – Waisenkind, the German word for "orphan," belonged to George's sister Hana, who died at the hands of the Nazis.

Attended by students from 21 schools in the Greater Toronto Area, the day-long seminar was sponsored by UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto and hosted by the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE).

Levine took the seminar's first question, "why is there so much antisemitism today?" and responded that there is no answer. All hatred and bigotry, she said, are wrong and evil. "What will you do to make a difference? How will you positively change the world?" she asked.

Brady told his personal story with openness and humour, stressing the need for tolerance and optimism. "There's always a way to turn things around," he said. "The identification number tattooed on my arm is the best thing I have; it reminds me that I have no problems."

Brady noted that when he speaks with student groups, whatever their size or culture, they are consistently captivated. "It's not the applause that is significant; it's the quietness."

Lorraine Sandler, Chair of the Holocaust Centre's Education Committee, spoke about the heightened awareness of antisemitism and the urgency to educate all youth about their individual responsibility in creating a civil society. Seargents Heidi Schellhorn and Shauna Leitch, of York Region's Hate Crimes Division, also participated in the day. Echoing Sandler, Schellhorn reinforced the division's agenda for vigilance and the need for each of us to monitor our own behaviour and safeguard each other's welfare.

The art of the grant: free seminars for Jewish artists

By CHERYL LANDY
UJA Federation

For artists who have never applied for public funding, the thought of getting through the grants process can be daunting.

That's why UJA Federation has come together with the Toronto Jewish Arts Council to provide seminars for artists in Toronto's Jewish community to help them get through the process. The seminars are free, require advance registration and will offer important information relevant to artists who have never applied for public funding, those who have never been successful in their applications, and those looking for something new.

The first seminar will take place Monday, June 7 at 7 p.m. at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. The panel will include experts from every level of government from which funding for artists is available. They include grants officers from the Department of Heritage, the Ontario Arts Council, the Toronto Arts Council, the Trillium Foundation and the Small Theatre Administrative Facility (STAF), a not-for-profit organization that enables artists to create quality works while allowing professional administrators and publicists to handle their management and promotion needs.

This series of seminars, a first for the Toronto Jewish Arts Council, will help bring together artists from across the community and across art forms.

One of the goals of the seminar is to receive feedback on the needs of the Jewish arts community.

The Toronto Jewish Arts Council will soon present its first grants to five visual artists, who will each receive $5,000. The council is also compiling the first web-based Jewish Arts Directory, in the Arts Council and Directory area of UJA Federation's web site, www.jewishtoronto.com.

To register for the seminar, contact Shelly Rotman at 416-635-2883 ext. 137 or at srotman@ujafed.org.

Jewish life in Toronto – taking it to the streets

Living in Toronto – one of Canada's most vibrant Jewish communities, it's easy to take things for granted. Can we remember a time when the Jewish community wasn't a dynamic presence in the city? More than that, when do we ever stop to explore how it all came to be?

That's the essence of what UJA Federation's Sense of Spadina tours do, every time they hit the streets of old Jewish Toronto. And a new season of tours is ready to begin.

Ontario Jewish Archives Director Ellen Scheinberg is proud of the tour's development and current revitalization plans. "We have grown from a modest program conducting two or three tours a year to a more substantial program, aimed at providing an active and exciting service to the entire community and tourists."

Established some 30 years ago, this unique initiative continues to branch out and set the standard for Jewish communities across North America, uniting people with their history in a hands-on way. The script and itinerary for the tour grew out of the dedicated efforts of volunteers, who meticulously recorded oral histories of area residents and merchants.

Cyrel Troster, a longtime, valued member of the Spadina tour team, is passionate about the program, the community, and the chance to bring its story to an expanded audience. "In 1974 when the tour began, we offered it to educators, school groups, synagogues and seniors. The number of participants and the frequency of tours was limited by a small, albeit committed, volunteer base."

There have been a lot of changes since, not only in the neighbourhood itself, but also in the tour's ability to promote its history. "Response is gratifying. Today, we are training many more guides, which will make this program more widely accessible," Troster notes. It's even starting to make inroads into the burgeoning simcha market – not sure what to do with your out-of-towners on the bar mitzvah weekend? Arrange a Sense of Spadina tour!

For information about participating in or booking a Sense of Spadina tour, contact Ontario Jewish Archives at 416-635-2883 ext. 170 or at oja1@ujafed.org.

Carville: Iraq has caused "considerable harm" to U.S. interests

By WENDY LAMPERT
UJA Federation

The man who masterminded Bill Clinton's rise to the White House in 1992 believes that U.S. President George W. Bush's decision to fight the war in Iraq has done "considerable harm" to American interests around the world.

James Carville, the veteran political strategist known as the "raging Cajun," told 500 of UJA Federation's leading donors last week that "Canada would be better served by a fresh perspective on U.S. policy" – namely that of Democratic presidential candidate John Kerry.

According to Carville, while President Bush is likely to stay his course, "he keeps pursuing policies that don't work. Failed policy is a pretty good reason to get rid of a government," he noted. "Kerry is more flexible. If one policy doesn't work, he'll try something else."

Carville said the decision to enter Iraq was made for the wrong reasons. "There was a basic assumption that you could remake the world with U.S. military might. They thought they could make democracy work in the Middle East, and see a flower bloom in the desert. They didn't look carefully at the history books."

Carville's lean figure, intense gaze and Louisiana drawl are familiar to anyone who follows American politics. The colourful Democrat is co-host of CNN's Crossfire, and appears regularly on Meet the Press with his Republican wife, Mary Matalin, assistant to President Bush and counselor to Vice President Dick Cheney.

Despite his wife's assurances to the contrary, he is already predicting a long, bitter battle for the White House, with a win for John Kerry and the Democrats in the November election. "I've never seen a campaign of this duration and this intensity," he noted. "There's no historical precedent."

The central difference, said Carville, is the continuing military hostilities in Iraq and recent revelations of extreme mistreatment of Iraqi prisoners of war at the hands of U.S. military personnel. "This is the kind of thing that happens in wartime," he added.

But Carville believes that if necessary, both presidential candidates would make the decision to leave Iraq. "Support for the war has dropped by 25 to 30% in the last three months. We will cut and run if we have to," he noted.

The political pundit said the election will hinge on a small number of votes from a tiny percentage of the U.S. population. Carville says political candidates generally know which states they will carry in the upcoming election. "The only states you try in are the ones you aren't sure of," he said. With about 75% of the states already decided, the 10% of U.S. voters who are undecided becomes inordinately important. "What that means," noted Carville, "is that 2.5% of America's citizens will decide who becomes the next president."

In the end, Carville believes that change is good – especially for Canada. That's why he's betting on John Kerry.

"Canadian interests are better served by a fresh perspective on U.S. policy."

March of the Living brings Jewish history home

By ROCHELLE KAHN
UJA Federation

Six million. A number that's burned into the consciousness of every Jew and singlehandedly tells a story of the Holocaust. But it's also such an unimaginable figure that, for those on the recent March of the Living, it couldn't convey the impact of a much smaller one.

In a forest outside the small Polish shtetl of Tykochin, 2,400 Jews lie in three mass graves. Last month, March of the Living participants from around the world visited their modest dwellings, walked into their beautifully appointed shul, and gained a palpable sense of who once comprised this tiny Jewish community, long destroyed. Standing in the forest outside of town, where those last Tykochin Jews walked to their death, the reality of that loss and lost potential came to life.

"For us on the March," explained Rabbi Glen Black, Regional Director of NCSY, "Tykochin took the six million and turned them into a small family, real people. You could almost hear a child asking a parent, as they walked from the shtetl to the forest, 'are we there yet?'"

Anita Ekstein, a Holocaust survivor and veteran March participant, agreed that as much as you can read about what happened, "until you're physically there, you can't imagine it." Particularly meaningful for Ekstein was sharing the experience with her grandson Eli. He reflected the same sentiment, noting the added dimension to familiar stories. "I never would have expected how much the trip would change me," Ekstein noted, "giving me a much better appreciation of my family, my Judaism; an overwhelming sense of Jewish pride."

Toronto March of the Living Chair, Dr. Irv Gottesman, stressed how the trip's Israel component is essential to bringing the experience home. "After seeing the death and destruction, coming to Israel is magical, mystical. Our youth are taught about being a Jew, past and present," Gottesman explained, "and they're compelled to think about what might have been, if only Israel had been an option then."

"The March has much to share about understanding our Jewish identity and what we need to carry into the next generation," observed Rabbi Lori Cohen of Toronto's Temple Sinai.

The March, sponsored in Toronto by UJA Federation, included 111 young participants.

Meeting members of the legislature

Jewish community leaders connected with several members of the Ontario legislature at a reception earlier this month sponsored by the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region. No Israeli security without Palestinian state: Lerner

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Michael Lerner takes a step back before delving into the meaning and origins of the Jewish Renewal movement and the "Tikkun Community" with which he's so closely associated.

"I can tell you what Judaism is," the noted liberal thinker and editor of Tikkun Magazine offers in a telephone interview with the The CJN prior to attending two conferences in Toronto this past week – his first trip to Canada. "Judaism is the argument that has been taking place for over 3,200 years over what Judaism is."

As Rabbi Lerner sees it, Jewish renewal offers an argument of its own, and a pretty radical one. It's "the attempt to restore Judaism to its deepest spiritual and ethical roots at a time when much of the Jewish leadership and communal institutions have sought to remake Jewish life in the image of contemporary materialism and selfishness."

A tall order, he concedes, but one that's needed to help shake modern Jewish thought from being mired in the belief that the universe cannot change, or be changed by humans.

"Many Jews who see themselves as religious are actually Hellenists in drag," Rabbi Lerner argues in blunt fashion, "because they believe the world cannot be fundamentally changed and that Jewish interests are best accommodated in maintaining the status quo.

"We," meaning the Tikkun Community of which he's co-chair, along with philosophers Cornel West and Susannah Heschel, "understand God as a force of healing and transformation in the universe," one that facilitates transformation "from that which is, to that which ought to be."

Rabbi Lerner and his growing cadre of followers around the world aim at nothing less than breaking "the tendency to pass on pain and cruelty from generation to generation" and encouraging "transcendence to generosity and compassion."

In other words, living up the ideals found in their name. The Hebrew word tikkun means to "transform," "heal," or "repair," and is often paired with olam – "the world."

Tikkun Magazine, founded in 1986 as a left/liberal alternative "to the voices of Jewish conservatism and spiritual deadness in the Jewish world," has been described by the New York Times as "one of the most influential and innovative voices in American intellectual, cultural and political life." After being quoted by former U.S. First Lady Hillary Clinton in her famous "It Takes a Village" speech, the media labeled Rabbi Lerner, at least for a while, as a White House guru.

But he's not without detractors. Many Jewish voices have heaped vitriol on him for his stance on the Israeli/Palestinian conflict, labeling him an enemy and a self-hating Jew for suggesting Israel has mistreated and dehumanized Palestinians.

"The Torah says love your neighbour, not love your neighbour only if he's nice," he counters. "It's absolutely categorical. You must love the stranger as yourself."

Rabbi Lerner headlined two local appearances, the first at "Spirit Matters: Wisdom Traditions and the Great Work," from May 13-16. The conference assembled a wide array of spiritual luminaries to explore the teachings of over a dozen religions and traditions on the "wellbeing of the Earth community."

The second event, entitled "Building Bridges: Spiritual Politics & Reconciliation at Home and in the Middle East," held last weekend, was touted as the first major effort of the Tikkun community of Toronto "to help to spread the Tikkun vision."

That vision hinges on five main points: "Ecological sanity;" a "new bottom line," away from money and power; peace and social justice; peace, justice and reconciliation for Israel and the Palestinians; and finally, spiritual components, including meditation, prayer, compassion, forgiveness and repentance.

If all that sounds a bit a squishy and leftish, Rabbi Lerner is quick to point out that he eschews labels of left and right, saying he and his movement have been critical of both.

"We trying to build a social movement that transcends old left/right categories. We are critical of the left for not being adequately sensitive to people's spiritual needs and hunger for meaning.

"The right, unlike the left, acknowledges that people have spiritual needs but they distort it because they associate it with demeaning 'the other.' In America, 'the other' is gays, lesbians and African-Americans. In Israel, it's Palestinians. In much of the Arab world, it's Jews and in Europe, it's Muslims.

"I've been challenging the left for failing to have adequate compassion for the Jewish people and [failing] to distinguish between Israeli politics and the fundamental legitimacy of the Zionist enterprise, which I support."

The tikkun movement advocates a "progressive middle path. We are pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian We oppose the occupation because we want a strong Israel and we are deeply dedicated to Israel's security and wellbeing."

A student of the late philosopher and Jewish theologian Abraham Joshua Heschel, Rabbi Lerner is also critical of Israel and the Palestinians.

"Both people are incredibly screwed up and have treated each other in ways that are morally insensitive and require serious tshuvah [repentance] on both sides.

"There is no possibility of Israeli security without the Palestinians achieving a viable economic and political state for themselves in a way that affirms their dignity and humanity."

To the Palestinians, he has this message: "There's no way to achieve a state without giving to the Jewish people physical security and [the] recognition of the humanity and fundamental decency of Jewish people."

It's not an easy task to summarize, but tikkunists "seek a post-triumphalist, post-tribal spirituality capable of responding to the universe with awe and wonder at the grandeur of creation."

Note to Zerbisias: Facts matter

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In a May 5 Toronto Star letter to the editor, Alan Dershowitz, the Harvard law professor and author of The Case for Israel, disputed an allegation by media columnist Antonia Zerbisias in her April 27 column, "Yet one more salvo over Jenin."

Describing an interview with Dershowitz in the documentary Jenin: Massacring Truth, Zerbisias wrote that he "supplies observations that darkly allude to how anti-Semitic any criticism of the Israeli government really is."

In his letter, Dershowitz wrote: "I have never said that, and I challenge Zerbisias to provide quotations to support her false characterization." To date, Zerbisias has been silent on the subject.

Journalists are supposed to be committed, above all else, to establishing the truth. This dispassionate search for truth – accomplished, if at all, by confronting one's prejudices – is often called objectivity, at least in some philosophy circles.

But journalistic objectivity may be impossible to achieve – and even unnecessary – according to veteran writer Robert Fulford. In his May 8 National Post column, "'Objective' journalism? There's no such thing," Fulford argued that the concept of objectivity should be abandoned as a "beguiling fiction," so rife with bias of one sort or another is the journalist's craft of telling stories.

Wrote Fulford: "[M]ost of us [have] discovered that describing human life without a point of view is impossible and probably not desirable." Referring to an article in the Columbia Journalism Review, he cites the types of biases he has in mind: attitudes towards conflict-driven stories, pack journalism, event-driven coverage, and even accepted wisdom.

In place of objectivity, Fulford favours fairness, which, he wrote, "is possible if writers understand their own biases." (One day, perhaps, he will elaborate on the term.)

Zerbisias' allegation against Dershowitz represented a form of bias in the extreme – a flagrant violation of accuracy that Fulford does not include on his list. There is no doubt that Fulford's critique of objectivity – his recognition of human interests and points of view that affect journalists' coverage – was not meant to deal with gross bias that violates the facts, whether deliberately, or inadvertently through sheer laziness or sloppiness.

Many, and perhaps most, journalists are committed to being both interesting and factual. Unfortunately, for some reporters no amount of evidence can contradict a deeply held prejudice. Such journalists must be held accountable.

In this case, Zerbisias, a media critic, attributed beliefs to Dershowitz for which there is no proof. His written and spoken words fly in the face of her accusations. In fact, the evidence that Dershowitz does not subscribe to these beliefs is so overwhelming that the only honourable and intellectually honest thing that Zerbisias can do is to admit that she was wrong, and that her bias against Dershowitz and, indeed, against Israel, blinded her to the facts.

In a news article last Friday, headlined "CBC addresses on-air 'mistake,'" Zerbisias reported on the network's admission that an error was made in Neil Macdonald's May 4 story for The National, which included a heavily biased and unsubstantiated allegation about Israeli involvement in the Iraqi prisoner abuse scandal. The CBC was compelled to issue a correction – or rather a "clarification" in the network's terminology. On May 7, it announced: "The fact is that there is no evidence that Israel was involved in what happened in the Iraqi prison." Zerbisias reported that the CBC released a statement about how this mistake came about.

Now that Zerbisias has reported on the CBC's acknowledgement of its serious factual error, perhaps it's time she turned her attention to her own unsubstantiated allegation against Dershowitz.

We're waiting.

Domestic violence a health issue, says JWI's Woman of the Year

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Violence against women is in large measure a health issue, says Toronto lawyer Jane Pepino, recently honoured as the 2004 Woman of the Year by Jewish Women International of Toronto.

"Domestic violence is more than an issue of equity or justice. Putting an abuser in jail does not heal the woman," she says.

Pepino, who received the Order of Canada in 2000, has served as president of the Metro Action Committee on Violence against Women and Children and chair of the board of Women's College Hospital. She is currently on the board of the amalgamated Sunnybrook and Women's College Sciences Centre.

The first ever female member of the Metropolitan Toronto Board of Commissioners of Police, she went on to become vice-chair and acting chair.

She is also founding chair of the Ontario Women's Health Council, an independent body established by the Ministry of Health in 1998 whose mandate is to advise the minister on matters relating to the improvement of women's health in Ontario.

With regard to domestic violence, Pepino says things have improved to the extent that more tools are available for determining who is a victim of abuse and who has been in an accident.

"Hospital emergency room workers are being trained to understand that when they see a woman with a broken arm, she has not necessarily fallen down the stairs.

"But, even though we can patch a woman up we cannot get enough [hospital] beds, and we cannot get court orders unless there are documented threats to a woman's life."

Among those who have obtained court orders, she says, there are still a good number who have been killed by their spouses.

"Even if there were enough effective tools available through the justice system, the woman needs to heal. She needs to deal with the impact that domestic violence has had on her life and on the life of her children, both emotionally and spiritually."

The reality, Pepino says, is if a man gets charged, his income is affected. "The woman is walking on a knife's edge. If he's not working, she has no income."

Organizations such as Jewish Women International are trying to stop the cycle of violence, says Pepino.

The organization currently has a waiting list for ASTEH – Alternative Short Term Emergency Housing, a kosher apartment run with Jewish Family & Child Service for women and their families who are fleeing abusive homes.

The only way to deal with domestic violence is to make it unacceptable for a man to feel he has entitlement, she says.

"I don't know how we'll get there, however. All we can do is pick away at the pieces in front of us, and then we can begin to see the larger picture.

"I am a firm believer in the power of one. Over the millennium women have quilted one piece at a time. It is when they stitch the pieces together that they get a quilt."

There is a "huge merit" to women's organizations, she says.

"Women do wonderful work in areas that men would not think about. The organizations do huge things; they work closer to where things happen."

Pepino obtains great satisfaction from her volunteer work. "I meet people I would not ordinarily meet, and I get the feeling that I have done something worthwhile."

Anyone can commit at least five hours a month to volunteer work, she says, "otherwise their life is out of control. If everyone else owns every hour of a person's life than something is wrong."

"If a person would deliver seven Meals on Wheels, they would have the opportunity of improving the life of seven other people. That is something [significant]."

Eitz Chaim to dedicate Torah scroll in solidarity ceremony

Eitz Chaim School will be holding a Hachnasas Sefer Torah – a dedication procession for a refurbished Torah scroll – at 11 a.m.on Sunday, May 23, at its Patricia Campus.

Hundreds of students, families, community members and dignitaries are expected to attend. Funds to repair the scroll were raised by Eitz Chaim students.

The project was undertaken by the school's students and administration in reaction to a series of recent anti-Semitic acts in Canada as "a positive response to violence and anti-social behaviour, particularly, the burning of a Jewish school library in Montreal," the school said in a statement.

"This [past] winter has seen the rise of anti-Semitism to unprecedented levels in our community, " said Rabbi Isser Pliner, dean of Eitz Chaim Schools.

"The burning of the library at United Talmud Torahs in Montreal and the horrific vandalism at Toronto schools, synagogues and cemetery, deeply affected our students. We wanted to do something positive."

Reena resident celebrates bat mitzvah

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Lori Steidman tells everyone her recent bat mitzvah was a highlight of her life, says Lynn Johnstone.

Steidman, 40, is developmentally challenged and lives in a group home operated by the Reena Foundation. Johnstone is her support worker.

"Lori talked about her bat mitzvah for weeks before, and invited many people to the bat mitzvah," Johnstone said. "My excitement for her was so great. It was a joy working with her, meeting with the rabbi. You could see her excitement growing. She kept telling everyone how excited she was."

"It was an unbelievable experience for everyone at Lori Steidman's bat mitzvah," said Toby Maskowitz, the community service chair of the Golda Meir chapter of Jewish Women International, which arranged the bat mitzvah for Steidman.

"It was so emotional that I don't believe there was a dry eye in the synagogue when Lori was on the bimah at the Beth Radom Synagogue and recited her portion. Just to see the joy in her eyes was enough," said Maskowitz, who retired four years ago as co-ordinator of chaplaincy services at the Jewish Family and Child Services.

Last Sukkot, at a party Golda Meir chapter had sponsored for Reena residents, Maskowitz approached Arlene Margolese, the volunteering and Judaic programming co-ordinator for Reena, about the possibility of a Reena resident having a bat mitzvah.

In October, the chapter approved the project, and members began making arrangements for Steidman to learn her portion and organizing a party for Reena residents, Steidman's guests and chapter members.

Rabbi Steven Shonblum of Beth Radom Congregation prepared a tape and a copy of the week's portion in bigger letters for Steidman. He also met with her regularly to teach her the portion phonetically in Hebrew.

Golda Meir chapter members helped choose Steidman's outfit, arrange the program and the refreshments for the party, hire disc jockeys and purchase gifts for Steidman.

"Lori doesn't have a family. Reena has become her family," Margolese told The CJN.

Years ago, Margolese explained, people with developmental disabilities were institutionalized. Doctors would encourage families to forget about their child with disabilities and get on with their own lives.

This gradually changed in the 1970s, and when deinstitutionalization later became public policy, people with disabilities began to go back into the community. But "some families weren't willing to re-establish contact with their disabled family members," she said.

When Reena was created, it accepted some of these individuals into its group homes.

There were more than 60 people at the bat mitzvah, Maskowitz said. "Everyone felt that they were part of Lori's extended family."

Golda Meir chapter president Roz Lewis presented Rabbi Shonblum with a plaque of gratitude.

"Rabbi Shonblum has invited Lori to come to services, and she feels that she now has another family," Johnstone said.

Maskowitz presented Steidman with a Land of Israel Haggadah, a Magen David and other gifts on behalf of the chapter.

"I really enjoyed my party," Steidman said.

"Reena appreciates this incredible mitzvah of fulfilling a lifelong dream of Lori's by giving her the opportunity to celebrate her bat mitzvah along with every other Jewish woman," Margolese said. "We always welcome the community's involvement in our programs and helping our clients celebrate lifestyle events."

Koffler Centre music programs hit the right notes

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

The Koffler Centre of the Arts has announced a slate of original programs and concerts in tune with the tastes of Toronto's music lovers.

Its music school has contributed to the city's culture for years, but with the latest additions, adults and children can participate in a variety of new classes, said school director Adrienne Cohen.

The Koffler Chamber Orchestra, an "exciting new venture" made possible by the support of Leslie and Anna Dan, is in the process of being launched, Cohen said.

Maestro Jacques Israelievitch, concertmaster of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra since 1988, has agreed to conduct the group, she said.

Since giving a concert for the Koffler Centre last year, Israelievitch has been interested in continuing his affiliation with the school, Cohen said. When asked to start the chamber orchestra, "he was very receptive," she said.

Israelievitch said he is "tremendously looking forward" to working with the orchestra.

"I love to conduct, I love to make music," he said. "The atmosphere at the Koffler Centre will lend itself very well to the project."

Summer auditions for the orchestra will be open to the public, and Israelievitch will be judging the candidates. Rehearsals will begin in November, says Cohen, and the orchestra's first performance will take place next February at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The school has also announced the creation of an opera program, thanks to a donation by Lindy Green, Cohen said.

Master classes for young advanced artists will be given weekly, with students performing for both conductor Sabatino Vacca and fellow musicians, Cohen said.

Guest artists, including Ermanno Mauro, will visit these sessions "to share their expertise," she said.

For children aged eight to 15 who "love to sing the latest hits," the school has designed a program featuring popular artists and genres. From hip hop to Broadway showtunes, kids can sing along with Allan Friedman, the BJCC's Centre Camp music co-ordinator, Cohen said.

Even babies and toddlers can take part in the action, as newborns to six-year-olds have been accounted for in programming, Cohen said.

Ruth Berger, previously involved with the Royal Conservatory of Music, will be holding children's music classes Tuesdays at the Koffler Centre beginning in the fall, Cohen said.

To add to the school's accomplishments, Cohen said Resa's Pieces, the Koffler Adult Band, had a "rousing fundraising performance at the Skymark Development recently."

The band came together four years ago, when people who had never before played an instrument and people who had been part of their high school bands joined "for fun," she said.

Led by conductor Resa Kochberg, Resa's Pieces is "a cohesive group" of 28 musicians who find the band experience "therapeutic."

Now in its fifth season, Resa's Pieces is holding its final concert of the term June 7 at the Leah Posluns Theatre.

The music doesn't stop there.

Cohen said the Koffler Salon Series will present three concerts at the Windsor Arms Hotel on Sundays in the fall. Performances will also be held in private homes, she said.

Also at the Windsor Arms Hotel, pianist and Juno award nominee Robert Silverman will join international wine connoisseur Tony Aspler for a wine tasting and piano concert on Nov. 7.

As well, this spring, the BJCC inaugurated a Koffler Jazz Café in its lobby, with local artists volunteering their time and talents for the enjoyment of the building's patrons, Cohen said. She hopes to have a regular performance schedule by the fall.

FEEDING THE HOMELESS: Grade 7 students at Bialik Hebrew Day School are taking tikkun olam very seriously. Here are some of the students who donated the ingredients and sandwiches to Ve'ahavta's project to feed the homeless.

York grad wins award to study Arabic in Israel

By ELYSSE ZAREK
Special to The CJN

A York University graduate student has won the Stephen Cooper award to study colloquial Arabic for beginners at Hebrew University this summer.

Hershel Recht, 24, is a master's student in political science, specializing in international relations and the Middle East. He believes that speaking and reading Arabic is essential to understanding the region and what ails it.

"How can you begin to understand the Arab mindset in the Mideast without understanding their language? If you don't understand their thoughts, then who the hell are you arguing with?" asks Recht.

Hershel Recht

The award, worth $1,600, will go toward paying his summer tuition at Hebrew University. The prize is administered by Beth Tzedec Congregation and is available to students up to age 30 with a commitment to the Jewish community to study overseas.

Recht's master's thesis, on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict and the prospects for peace, argues that without two willing partners for peace, the conflict cannot be resolved.

"If there's nobody to talk to, then there's nobody to talk to. But you can't absolve the Israelis of anything either," he says.

In preparation for his course, Recht has already started to learn Arabic.

"I'm learning the last two letters now," he says proudly. "When everybody else is learning the alphabet, I'll already know it."

Recht practises his Arabic pronunciation on the treadmill at the gym, and he admits his beginner's grunts have gotten him a few strange looks.

His interest in the Middle East grew after he saw the televised handshake between former Israeli prime minister Yitzchak Rabin and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat at the signing of the Oslo accords in 1993.

After completing his undergraduate degree in political science – on ethnic and nationalist conflicts and Canadian government policy – Recht applied to do his master's at York because several professors there, such as Saeed Rahnema, are Middle East experts.

But because York has few courses related to the Middle East, Recht developed his own course on Christian, Jewish, Islamic and Sikh fundamentalism and peace prospects in the Middle East. He has recently finished reading his 50th book on the topic.

Although Recht was at York during the clashes between pro-Israel and pro-Palestinian students, he has refused to get involved.

He says he won't even talk politics unless the person he is debating with has been to the Middle East and seen the situation on the ground. Recht went to Gaza several times in 1998, when he spent the year studying at Hebrew University and working on a kibbutz.

One of the things he has concluded is that the conflict is not going to be resolved any time soon.

"I don't think you can broker a peace conflict under these parameters," he says. "The Mideast is a constantly shifting paradigm that just can't sit still for five minutes.

"No one is going into the sea," he continues. "This is not the United States' Vietnam or the Soviet Union's Afghanistan. The Israelis, the Jews have nowhere to retreat to. Armed struggle will not convince the Israelis to give in."

Next year, Recht plans to create another course, this one on terrorism and its roots in modern times.

After he graduates, he wants to get a certificate in conflict resolution. His ultimate goal is to work as an ambassador, although he hasn't decided for which country.

גידי קורן וחברים

מה יהיה

חברי מרכז הליכוד, במבחן כוח נגד ראש הממשלה, בחרו בעד הישארות ישראל ברצועת עזה ונגד הורדת ישובים ישראלים. דעתם זו מנוגדת לרצונם של רוב הישראלים היושבים בישראל. מבחינת שלטון תקין- היתה השאלה צריכה להישאל במשאל עם, שהרי לא עולה על הדעת שרק חברי מרכז של מפלגה אחת יחליטו בעניין כל כך מכריע. תכליתית, לא היה שרון חייב בשום הצבעה בכלל. ישראל יצאה מסיני ומלבנון ללא שום הצבעה. אלא שעכשיו, אחרי שהצביע, קשה לו להיחלץ מן התוצאה ולאמר "פיס, משנים את המשחק". ושוב, התהליך המדיני במזרח התיכון נקלע למצב האידיוטי שבו הקיצונים משני הצדדים מחליטים על סדר היום: גם עראפת וגם מרכז הליכוד נגד יציאה מעזה. זה כשלעצמו הוא סימן שהיציאה טובה לעם ישראל. צריך לקוות ששרון ימצא מוצא מהפלונטר הזה, כפי שיצא ממאות פלונטרים דומים בעבר. ביתמים ימשיכו חיילים בני שמונה עשרה ומילואמניקים בני ארבעים ליהרג על האדמות המקוללות של עזה. אבל שישאר בינינו.

אלופי אירופה

מכבי תל אביב היא אלופת אירופה. אידוע בהחלט משמח בחוויה האינטנסיבית הישראלית שהיא הרבה פעמים קשה מאוד. הזיכרון הקולקטיבי מעלה באוב את הזכייה המפורסמת הראשונה לפני יותר מעשרים שנה, שאחריה הטביע טל ברודי את הסיסמא "אנחנו על המפה". שימו לב- השמות שזכורים מאז הם מיקי ברקוביץ' ומוטי אראסטי. ועכשיו? אין בחמישיה הראשונה אפילו אחד שמדבר עברית. זה אולי לא מוריד מגודל הזכיה כי הרי אלה הם החוקים- אבל אולי כדאי קצת להוריד מן הפאתוס והמילים המתלהמות ולשים את האירוע בפרופורציה המתאימה: לחקת רקדני בֶּלֶט בינלאומיים מעולים עם כוריאוגראף ישראלי שמוציא מהם את המקסימום וקהל שמאוד אוהב אותם. אבל כמו תמיד- שישאר בינינו.

גבר דומה לתזמורת

תודה לדני על ההברקה הבאה:
"גבר דומה לתזמורת:
עד גיל עשרים הוא דומה לחליל: רק נוגעים בו וכבר מנגן.
גיל 30-20 לכינור: צריך לכוון 10 דקות כדי לנגן שעה.
גיל 40-30 לצלו: צריך לכוון חצי שעה כדי לנגן עשר דקות.
גיל 50-40 לפסנתר: מנגן רק באצבעות.
גיל 60-50 למנצח: מנחה אחרים מה לעשות.

דברים בשם אומריהם

מוסף יום עצמאות של ידיעות אחרונות החיל את "מילון הקלישאות הישראלי". היו שם הרבה דברים משעשעים וחכמים. היתה מבחר קטן וחזק:
"העולם כולו נגדנו:
.....יש משהו מעצבן בזה שמישהו מבחוץ אומר בקול רם את מה שאנחנו נוהגים להגיד על עצמנו בכל הזדמנות..."(איר לפיד).
"חברת התעופה הבטוחה בעולם:
....וגם יעד מספר 1 לחתקפת טרור. ונשאלת השאלה, מה מסוכן יותר: להפקיד את חייך בידי המאבטחים המעט פחות מיומנים של ק-ל-מ או לטוס ישיר עד ניו יורק במטוס מלא ישראלים?(התשובה הנכונה: אין כמו שופינג באמסטרדם)"(אבנר ברנהיימר)
"אנחנו על המפה:
....המנטרה הפטריוטית המפורסמת ביותר. יש משהו נוגע ללב ברצוננו התמידי להיות על המפה.....גם אנשים שלא גרים בארץ שלושים וחמש שנה חופכים להיות ישראלים ברגע שחצליחו במשהו. העיקר שנחיה על המפה...(איר לפיד).

Organic kosher poultry finds its niche

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – Yehuda Wurm is an osteopath, a practitioner of a treatment that involves gentle manipulation of the tissues to correct mechanical imbalances in the body that cause pain or disability. As a third-degree black belt in the martial arts, he has suffered his share of aches.

Wurm takes a holistic approach to health and is very careful about what he eats. He is a baal tshuvah, having embraced Orthodoxy about eight years ago.

Eating organic foods as much as possible was important to him. But where do you get organic kosher products?

Unable to find what he was looking for, Wurm launched his own business two years ago. Tiferet Organic Poultry, which specializes in certified organic chicken, duck and turkey as well as a recent addition, organic salmon from Scotland, is a first in Canada.

Wurm's products have the hechsher of Montreal's Vaad Ha'ir and the New York-based Orthodox Union. The Central Rabbinical Congress also puts its stamp on chickens sold in cases of eight. All the birds are slaughtered and processed at Marvid Poultry, a long-established kosher facility.

Today, Wurm has a market in Montreal, as well as in Toronto and the United States. His products, he says, occupy a very narrow niche. Organic kosher poultry costs about double what regular kosher poultry does.

Wurm regards what he is doing as a "mission," making the most naturally and humanely raised poultry accessible to the kosher consumer. Among his most loyal customers are chassidic Jews, he said. He supplies live birds to some chassidic communities that perform their own shchitah.

Products labelled organic must also be certified, and the Tiferet line has the stamp of two regulating bodies: Quebec's Garantie Bio, as well as Eco-Cert, which Wurm said is recognized throughout North America. Wurm works in partnership with Frank Andrasi, an organic farmer and food distributor for 30 years.

The birds they sell are raised on Quebec farms without drugs such as antibiotics or growth hormones. If they get sick, they are immediately removed from the flock. They eat only certified organic grains and legumes, grown without pesticides and chemical fertilizers and not genetically modified.

Tiferet Organic Poultry is sold mainly in butcher and specialty shops in Montreal and Toronto, and by order for home delivery through its website (www.tiferetorganic.com). Requests have come from as far as Halifax and Calgary. Recently, IGA began selling the line.

His aim is to reach one to two per cent of the Canadian Jewish population.

"We're looking for the modern Orthodox Jew who is a little more worldly and has a bit of gelt."

Three charged for UTT firebombing in Montreal

Police released little information about the suspects before the bail hearing, where evidence was to be read. They would not say where they were arrested, whether they are linked to any group or if police had received any tips that led to the arrests.

Four days before the arrests, police released a picture of a suspicious car parked outside the school that had been taken by a surveillance camera about four hours before the attack in the early morning hours of April 5. It was the first lead they had made public. On the same day, B'nai Brith Canada added $35,000 to a $15,000 reward offered by the Sun Youth Organization for information leading to the arrest and conviction of the perpetrators.

"The initial reaction of the community is one of relief," said Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region chair Jeffrey Boro. "When people who have committed a crime are at large, there is serious tension in the community – will they be back, who are they?

"The fact that those charged are reportedly of Middle Eastern origin is of concern but not of surprise after the note that was left. But I don't think they represent mainstream thought in Muslim or Arab thinking in Canada."

Boro pointed out that the group that signed the crime-scene note is not known in these communities.

Boro commended the police for doing an "excellent job" and believes the decision to set up a unit devoted to the investigation of hate crimes allowed the arrests to be made within "a short period of time."

UTT executive director Sidney Benudiz said there is some relief at the school, but with so little known about the motives and why the school was target, the anxiety lingers.

B'nai Brith Canada "applauded the police for their diligence in investigating" the incident, said community outreach co-ordinator Yoni Petel.

Jewish studies conference to honour historian

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Author and historian Abe Arnold is being honoured for his work in Canadian Jewish studies at this year's conference of the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies (ACJS).

The conference will be held from May 30 to June 1 at the Asper Jewish Community Campus and the University of Manitoba.

Arnold, who was recently appointed a member of the Order of Canada, will receive the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies Distinguished Service Award in recognition of his lifetime achievement in the study and documentation of the Canadian Jewish experience.

The ACJS began as the Canadian Jewish Historical Society (CJHS) some 30 years ago. With the support of the Canadian Jewish Congress, CJHS published a periodical that featured articles on the history of Jews in Canada. The society began to incorporate other subjects such as Canadian Jewish genealogy, sociology, geography, literature, fine art, religion, architecture and demography and began presenting scholarly papers at annual conferences. Several years ago, the organization changed its name to ACJS.

One of the founding member organizations of CJHS was the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada, of which Arnold himself was a founding member. Originally from Montreal, Arnold moved to Winnipeg in 1965, where he worked as chief executive of the Western region of the Canadian Jewish Congress. After he retired, he continued working as a freelance journalist and broadcaster and was the founding director of the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada from 1968 to 1975. He is the author of two books and numerous articles in both scholarly and popular journals and has won awards for his work in journalism and his research in Canadian Jewish history.

ACJS secretary Susan Landau-Clark said the sessions in this year's conference, whose main theme is Jewish dissent, "speak to the breadth and depth of the Jewish experience in Canada. From coast to coast, every aspect of Jewish life and learning from the early 1900s to the 1960s to the issues facing our community today is examined and laid bare for discussion."

Among the papers being delivered are "Jewish Dissent in Canada: The United Jewish Peoples Order" by York University associate professor Ester Reiter and Roz Usiskin, past president of the Jewish Heritage Society of Western Canada; "Mapping Jewish Dissent: Jewish Anti-Occupation Activism in Toronto" by Sheryl Nestel of the University of Toronto; and "Kol Koreh Bamidbar: Jewish Dissent in the Academy" by Michael Benazon of Montreal. Benazon will also be reading a paper by University of Montreal history professor Yakov Rabkin on "Patterns of Jewish Dissent: Canada and Israel."

The keynote session, in the afternoon, will include a presentation by Arnold and Usishkin on "Celebration of the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada: 36 Years of Accomplishment," a memorial tribute to the late poet Miriam Waddington by researcher Richard Menkis of the University of British Columbia, and a presentation on the architectural history of Winnipeg's Shaarey Zedek Synagogue by Ottawa scholar Hagit Hadaya.

The reception in Arnold's honour and the presentation of the ACJS Distinguished Service Award are scheduled for late in the afternoon. They will be followed by a tribute from the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada on his recent appointment to the Order of Canada.

The conference will also include presentations on Montreal Jewish history, anti-Semitism in Canada, Canadian Jewish education, social and cultural issues and many others.

For those interested in Yiddish/Jewish literature, Landau-Clark said, Chava Rosenfarb's Survivors: Seven Short Stories will be available in English at the conference. Rosenfarb, a Montrealer, is one of the most prominent Yiddish writers living today. This spring, Cormorant Books published the collection of short stories translated from the Yiddish by her daughter Goldie Morgentaler.

This is the first time a book of Rosenfarb's writing has been published in English in Canada. Rosenfarb will read excerpts from her book and will be available for book signing.

SIDDUR CEREMONY: Grade 1 students at USDS Bathurst campus recently celebrated their Siddur Ceremony. The students, together with their parents, personalized their siddur cover that will serve them for many years to come.

Homeless artist inspires creation of mentoring program

By RUTH SCHWEITZER
Special to The CJN

With the support of a local artist and the director of homeless initiatives at Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, a Toronto homeless man got off the streets after his artistic talent was discovered.

Ve'ahavta's Darryl Borden says two years ago, Moose, who had been living on the city's streets on and off for some 23 years, gave him a sculpture made out of wire coat hangers. Moose called his sculpture of two hands reaching out Hands of Hope.

Borden stashed the sculpture in the Street Help van. The van, operated by Ve'ahavta in co-ordination with the Native Men's Residence, travels through Toronto's back alleys to feed and clothe the homeless one night a week.

One evening, Borden was out helping the homeless with artist Ian Leventhal, who spotted Moose's sculpture in the van. He declared it brilliant and asked to meet Moose.

"Through the admiration of Ian and through my encouragement, Moose blossomed," Borden says. "It was as if he realized he had a place in society as opposed to being outside of society, where many homeless people feel they belong."

Boosted by his new self-esteem, Moose came in off the streets.

"This relationship gave him the strength and courage to jump through hoops and get himself an apartment," Borden says.

Borden realized that more than one Moose lived in Toronto and in homeless populations around the world. That led to the birth of Tiferet Boulevard, a program in which professional artists develop mentoring relationships with artistically talented people living on the street.

Tiferet is a kabbalistic term that means glory and has a connotation of vision and beauty, Borden says, and is found in some Jewish prayers.

"What we've done is taken what is good in humanity and attached it to the street," he says.

Tiferet Boulevard has had a strong start in Toronto thanks to the efforts of Leventhal, who spread the word about the program to Toronto artists.

"Many Jewish artists jumped at the opportunity to give it a try," Borden says.

Ve'ahavta is also planning to bring Tiferet Boulevard to cities around the globe and recently launched the program's first international component in Israel.

"We thought if we could make this bridge between Toronto and Israel and make it work, then that would encourage other communities to participate," Borden says.

In the past year-and-a-half, Borden and Leventhal visited Israel twice and has worked with Elem: The Voice of Troubled Youth in Israel to help Jewish and Arab homeless youth in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Acco and Haifa. The duo showed them some of the artwork made by Toronto's homeless people.

When they returned to Toronto, Borden and Leventhal brought artwork created by Israeli street youth to young people at drop-in centres and shelters here. That art shows Israel and the Jewish people's human face, Borden says.

"Most people still think Israel is a land of milk and honey, with no residual effects from the war."

Today, the artwork produced by Israel's homeless youth is part of an exhibit of works by and about the homeless at the Blue Dot Gallery in Toronto's Distillery District. It continues until May 26.

More than 400 people attended a recent fundraiser at the gallery. Moose was there, too, with a collection of wire-hanger sculptures.

"Many people at the show probably saw, for the first time, homeless people expressing themselves in ways that could be understood," Borden says. "They stood side by side with homeless artists and they were having conversations with people who they previously thought didn't have an opinion they could share."

In the gallery, signs held by the homeless in the streets, such as "If your (sic) happy and you know it… Spare Change," were scattered among the artwork.

Among the works is a sculpture of a yellowish figure on a red sleeping bag called When I Sleep, by Rita Rayman.

For more information on the exhibit, visit www.veahavta.org.

Viewers study a wire-coat hanger sculpture called Hands of Hope by "Moose," an artist who moved off the streets and inspired Ve'ahavta's Tiferet Boulevard program that co-ordinates the work of 26 artists, 300 homeless youth and more than a dozen social service agencies in Canada, the United States and Israel. The sculpture is on display until May 26 at the Blue Dot Gallery in Toronto's Distillery District.

Creamy cheesecake pleasures for Shavuot

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

When Rose Levy Beranbaum's Cordon Rose Cream Cheesecake was featured on Shirley Corriher's radio show, the avalanche of mail requesting the recipe was the largest in the history of the station. And no wonder. Does there breathe a human for whom cheesecake is not one of life's guilty pleasures? But why the guilt? Is it not a mitzvah to indulge for Shavuot, the "cheese" holiday?

While scholars may argue as to why we eat dairy – the abundance of milk at this time and the association of the Torah with "milk and honey" are just two of the usual explanations – my immediate concern is turning out the perfect cheesecake, a creamy, crackless wonder as luscious to the eyes as it is to the palate.

Last year, while attending the annual conference of the International Association of Culinary Professionals in Montreal, I had the rare opportunity to network with three of North America's foremost bakers, to learn from their wisdom and forge new friendships.

I can't think of Montreal without remembering the crazy taxi ride I took with Elinor Klivans, author of Fearless Baking, to visit Marcy Goldman, who had graciously invited us for breakfast. A 15-minute ride turned into an hour – and I thought that only happens in New York – but we finally arrived, and who should be sitting there, none other than Rose Levy Beranbaum, author of The Cake Bible. (Later, when we took a "field trip" to an incredible baking supply store, a star-struck young salesgirl almost fell over when she recognized Levy Beranbaum.)

Goldman's kitchen, while intimate and homey, is set up for business. Tall, commercial bakers' racks await her latest experiments. Flour, sugar, etc. are stored in huge, under-the-counter bins. She's got a six-burner, double-oven gas range, three bread machines, and everything screams, "Major testing happens here!"

When the conversation turned to cheesecake, I was all ears. First the ingredients. "Room temperature ingredients, especially the cream cheese and eggs, always makes for more height," cautioned Goldman, "and use the whisk attachment of the mixer, but mix on slow speed. Too much air makes for cracks in cheesecake later on."

The "Cheesecake 101" section of her cookbook, The best of betterbaking.com (Ten Speed Press), has more great tips. One I know I need to be more careful about is scraping down the bowl often to incorporate any globs of cream cheese hiding in the batter.

The book contains recipes for many kinds of cheesecake, "but my favourite for Jewish festivals like Shavuot," said Goldman, "is the Halvah Filo Cheesecake [found on her website, www.betterbaking.com]. It is upbeat and contemporary, but uses Old Testament ingredients, so to speak, like honey and sesame. I am sure they would have made it the first Shavuot, but they were out of springform pans!"

All three were emphatic on baking

Rose Levy Beranbaum

cheesecakes in a water bath. "For many years I baked cheesecakes for a local restaurant," recalled Klivans. "I baked hundreds of them and usually baked four at a time in my oven. Some would crack and some not. After much research, I realized that cheesecakes are actually custards, and they like to bake in a warm, moist environment."

"And grease the sides of the pan so it can pull away from the sides rather than cracking from the middle," added Levy Beranbaum. "I wrap the pan in two layers of heavy-duty foil to make sure that no water seeps in. I set the pan in a larger pan and pour in about two inches of hot tap water."

Not for nothing is Levy Beranbaum's cookbook called The Cake Bible. From a simple pound cake to crystallized flowers and spun sugar cages, her recipes are easy to follow, beautifully illustrated and so clearly explained they will appeal to the home baker as well as the seasoned professional. I love her favorite implement for cutting cheesecake: unwaxed dental floss. Look for Levy Beranbaum's new-series, Baking Magic with Rose, airing soon on PBS.

Perhaps the simplest but best advice came from Klivans, whose cookbook Fearless Baking is more than a collection of recipes. It is a step-by-step baking course designed to instil confidence in even the most timid beginner. Two new books, Big Fat Cookies and Cupcakes, are due for release in 2005.

"Take your time when baking," Klivans told me. "Whenever I try to hurry, I find that I have made some sort of major mistake. That is when I see the cup of sugar on the counter that I forgot to put in my cake. Check to see that you have all of your ingredients on hand before you begin. And, most important, have a good time!"

CORDON ROSE CREAM CHEESECAKE

From The Cake Bible by Rose Levy Beranbaum (William Morrow).

2 (8-oz.) packages cream cheese
1 cup sugar
1 tbsp. cornstarch (optional)*
3 large eggs
3 tbsp. freshly squeezed lemon juice
1½ tsp. pure vanilla extract
¼ tsp. salt
3 cups sour cream

Preheat oven to 350. In a large mixing bowl beat the cream cheese and sugar until very smooth (about 3 minutes), preferably with a whisk beater. Beat in the cornstarch if desired.* Add the eggs, 1 at a time, beating after each addition until smooth and scraping down the sides. Add the lemon juice, vanilla, and salt and beat until incorporated. Beat in the sour cream just until blended.

Pour the batter into the prepared pan. Set the pan in a larger pan and surround it with 1 inch of very hot water. Bake 45 minutes. Turn off the oven without opening the door and let the cake cool for 1 hour. Remove to a rack and cool to room temperature (about 1 hour). Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate overnight. Serves 8 to 12.

Note: This cheesecake is firm enough to be unmoulded and served without a base if desired. For a cookie crumb crust, Levy Beranbaum says: "As crumb crusts become soggy if placed in the pan before baking, I prefer to pat the crumbs onto the cake after baking and unmoulding." Use ¾ cup crumbs for the top and sides.

Variation: For banana cheesecake, replace 1 cup sour cream with 1 cup mashed bananas. (You will need 2 very ripe bananas.) To keep the banana from discolouring, stir the 3 tablespoons of lemon juice into the mashed banana. Blend into the batter after the sour cream is incorporated.

*If cornstarch is omitted, a small amount of liquid will seep out after unmoulding, which can be absorbed with a paper towel. For a slightly creamier cake, Levy Beranbaum prefers not to use the cornstarch.

Folk dancing group celebrates 40th year

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

When Don Jubas and his wife Gilda started their folk dancing group, they didn't expect to still be dancing 40 years later.

"We're all surprised," he said. "Nobody kept notes of when things happened because we didn't expect this."

Forty years ago, Jubas and his wife attended a convention in New York City. Their hotel brought in a local dance teacher to teach the guests how to dance in the style used in the movie Zorba the Greek.

For three days, Don, Gilda and some of their friends danced before lunch.

"On the drive back from New York City, my wife suggested we learn folk dancing," Jubas said.

She knew a couple who did Israeli dancing and she asked them to teach the newly formed group.

"They taught us for three or four years," Jubas said.

The group then decided they wanted to branch out and learn different kinds of dances.

Jubas and the group approached their teachers, who said, "That's fantastic! We'd like to learn more dances too."

The group tried out six or seven different teachers until they finally settled on one.

The folk dancing group now consists of 15 couples in their 70s, about half of them original members.

"It has become a social thing now," Jubas said, "We just like to get together."

The group dances together once a month and has a pool party in the summer.

In celebration of their 40 years of dancing, Jubas organized a party for May 15.

"We invited everyone who is in the group, everyone who has been a member of the group and all of our teachers," Jubas said.

He said he expected about 50 people to attend the party, where there was dancing, refreshments and time to reminisce.

Not all of the group's past members planned to be there, however. "Some couldn't come for health reasons, some died, some couples split up, and some people, I guess, just got tired of dancing," Jubas said.

"I got the best response from the people who aren't in the group anymore," he added.

As for how long he will continue to dance, Jubas said he doesn't know.

"It's hard to believe some of us are still dancing anyway."

Seniors, youth create colorful murals at Wagman Centre

A large art project has brought youth and seniors together at Baycrest's Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre.

For the past two months, youth from the Harbourfront Community Centre Mural Project have been working with a group of Wagman Centre members to create colourful murals on four grey concrete pillars in the basement of the Wagman Centre.

Wagman members have directed the project from the beginning, deciding that each pillar would represent one of the four seasons.

The Harbourfront artists prepared the pillars by painting them in bright seasonal colors, and the seniors, who chose the colours, drew and painted the overlaying images that wrap around each one.

To overcome the difficulties of trying to paint on large ground-to-ceiling pillars, the seniors sat at tables and painted their images onto large puzzle pieces that fit perfectly into designated spots on each pillar.

Ted Rosen, 86, who has little painting experience, painted an outdoor ice hockey scene for the winter pillar. He selected a unique combination of colours in order to create a realistic looking ice surface for his hockey rink.

"It makes me feel ageless when I'm painting," says Rosen, a retired psychiatrist. "It's a great feeling of living and self-expression."

At first many of the seniors were hesitant to participate in the project, says Youth Harbourfront artist Michael Brown.

"They were saying 'I'm not an artist, I can't do it or I can't see very well,'" he recalls.

Youth artist Amelia Morochove-Merhar (right) watches as Wagman member Nancy Gold paints a colourful scene that forms part of the murals that adorn each of four concrete pillars in the Wagman Centre basement. [Mara Swartz photo]

By the third week of the project, they had no fear about creating and were clearly enjoying themselves.

For Baycrest therapeutic recreationist Mara Swartz, watching the seniors' delight in the process of creating art is "simply magical. It's very inspiring. I not only see their artistic ability, but how they are able to overcome physical challenges to create a piece of art."

Harbourfront artist Alisha Zaidi, 19, said, "If you've ever held a brush or drawn a picture in your life, you don't forget it no matter what age you are."

The pillars were celebrated in a ceremony at the Wagman Centre on May 5th.

Rice urges Qureia to reform Palestinian security forces

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

BERLIN — U.S. National Security Adviser Condoleezza Rice urged Palestinian Prime Minister Ahmed Qureia at their meeting in Berlin on Monday to reform the Palestinian security forces.

She also told Qureia that the United States does not believe that Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat is conducive to the peace process, and that the PA must battle terrorism.

Quoting Palestinian sources, Israel Radio reported Monday that Qureia presented Rice with a cease-fire plan, saying that the truce is needed before the PA can reform security forces. Qureia also once again proposed that foreign observers be posted in the area to uphold the ceasefire.

Israel Radio reported Monday that the plan would offer a full ceasefire, under which Israel will be asked to stop all targeted assassinations of militants and all military operations within Palestinian Authority administrated areas.

Rice's comments echoed remarks made a day early by U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell. He, too, urged the Palestinian leadership to take control of their security forces away from Arafat.

"What they need to do is to wrest control of the security forces from Chairman Arafat ... The Palestinian leaders can do it, and the leaders of the Arab world can do it, by saying to Chairman Arafat that 'your policies have not been successful, your leadership has not been successful in moving this process forward,'" Powell said.

Powell admitted that even opening negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians was only a remote possibility.

"I don't see how we can get there right away," Powell said in Shannon, Ireland, where his Air Force jetliner refueled en route to Washington.

Still, Powell said, U.S. President George W. Bush "has made it clear to me to keep going."

Powell also suggested that Palestinian and other Arab leaders should persuade Arafat, symbol of the Palestinian movement for almost four decades, to quit as head of the PA to make way for a successor willing to end terror against Israel.

"Mr. Arafat continues to take action and make statements that make it exceptionally difficult to move forward," he said.

Qureia appealed to Rice on Monday to stop Israel's mass demolition plan in the southern Gaza Strip town of Rafah.

"He asked Condoleezza Rice to immediately intervene to stop the catastrophe in Rafah," Minister for Negotiations Saeb Erekat told Reuters by telephone from Berlin.

Erekat said that Rice had reassured Qureia that the United States is committed to the establishment of a Palestinian state, alongside Israel.

Rice said Sunday that the United States was ready to be a partner in helping Palestinians build their own state.

"The institutions of statehood need to get started now," Rice said.

The national security adviser said she would tell Qureia that the U.S. offer of partnership depends on the Palestinians' building "accountable political and economic institutions, including security services controlled by an empowered prime minister who can use them to fight terrorism.

"We are ready to be full partners with the Palestinians in doing that," she said. "We need movement from the Palestinians on those elements of the road map."

American and Israeli sources said that they did not expect the meeting to result in any dramatic decisions. The U.S. administration is still very angry at the PA for failing to apprehend the murderers of three American security personnel in Gaza seven months ago, the sources noted.

Thousands march to protest rise in anti-Semitic acts in France

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — At least 9,000 people marched in eastern Paris on Sunday to denounce a recent increase in anti-Semitic acts in France.

An array of lawmakers and celebrities took part in the march, triggered mainly by recent cases of vandals spray-painting swastikas and other anti-Semitic graffiti on Jewish sites in eastern France.

"What is awakening in France these days is a poison – it's anti-Semitism," Paris mayor Bertrand Delanoe told reporters at the front of the march organized by human rights groups and political parties.

Organization of the protest was marked with controversy, however. Two anti-racism groups – MRAP and the Human Rights League – initially had sought to broaden the protest to denounce all forms of racism, but SOS Racisme and several Jewish groups opposed that idea.

A street-wide banner at the head of the demonstration read: "A black, white, and Arab France against anti-Semitism."

Organizers urged marchers to avoid waving Israeli flags – only French flags were authorized. The few people who did bring out Israeli flags were delicately asked to leave the parade or tuck them away.

Meanwhile, War Veterans Minister Hamlaoui Mekachera joined Jewish, Muslim and Christian religious leaders at a ceremony in eastern France to condemn vandalism at a monument honouring Jewish soldiers who died in the Battle of Verdun in World War I.

Overnight on May 7, vandals painted swastikas and other neo-Nazi graffiti across the monument, the centrepiece of the Jewish section of a national cemetery honoring the war dead.

"By insulting the remembrance of our soldiers of Jewish faith who gave their lives for our land, they offended the entire nation," President Jacques Chirac wrote in comments read by Mekachera.

One of the other most significant in a string of recent anti-Semitic incidents occurred last month when unknown vandals used red paint to draw swastikas and other anti-Semitic graffiti on more than 120 headstones at a Jewish cemetery in the town of Herrlisheim.

In the last several years, France has suffered a wave of violence against Jewish schools, synagogues and cemeteries that coincided with new fighting in the Middle East. Many of the attacks have been blamed on young Muslims.

The interior ministry has reported 67 anti-Semitic acts in the first quarter of the year in France, a 60 per cent increase from the same time a year earlier. Most have prompted swift condemnation by top government officials.

"The silence must disappear and give way to truth," French filmmaker Elie Chouraqui told marchers, estimated at 9,000 by police and 20,000 by organizers. "France is not an anti-Semitic country. There are anti-Semitic acts that we must react against."

Yitzhak Rabin High School is a small Jewish Community High School established in Ottawa, Canada's National Capital, in 1995. As a traditional, Zionist school committed to offering a superlative Judaic and general studies programme, we offer young women and men an enriched, college preparatory curriculum in the humanities, sciences, mathematics and social sciences and an intensive programme of Judaic Studies designed to equip graduates for success in university and for leadership in adult life. Our well-rounded curriculum exceeds all standards set by the Ontario Ministry of Education and Training.

We are currently seeking a dynamic and engaging Judaic Studies teacher to fill a full-time position in our school to teach Jewish history, Talmud and Tanakh. The position may include some broader community responsibilities as well. The successful candidate will hold a university degree in relevant subject areas, be fluent in Hebrew, will have 5 or more years of secondary-school teaching experience and hold appropriate professional credentials. We offer an attractive salary and the opportunity to contribute to the expansion and development of our school's offerings.

Interested candidates are invited to submit their curriculum vitae, including the names and contact information of three references to: Judaic Studies Search Committee, Yitzhak Rabin High School, 1645 Woodroffe Avenue, Ottawa, ON K2G 1W2.

ISRAELIS RALLY FOR GAZA PULLOUT:
Some 120,000 Israelis called for Israel's withdrawal from the Gaza Strip at a Tel Aviv rally last Saturday night in Rabin Square. Labor party leader Shimon Peres told the crowd that 80 per cent of Israelis want peace, and former Shin Bet security chief Ami Ayalon said withdrawal from Gaza and the West Bank is needed to preserve Zionism, but added that Israel's left wing must show more sensitivity to the feelings of Jewish settlers who would be evacuated. A source in the Prime Minister's Office said Prime Minister Ariel Sharon considered the rally an important gauge of public opinion that could help his efforts to revive his disengagement plan.

When military necessity outflanks individual rights

By ZE'EV SEGAL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

The High Court of Justice ruling last week on a petition against the demolition of houses near the Philadelphi route in Gaza is based on a general legal principle: house demolitions by the Israel Defence Forces are legitimate only "for an immediate and definitive military need" connected to protecting the lives of soldiers in the field.

The justices rejected the petition in light of the state's announcement that the military operation in question had been halted. But an earlier decision in this case – the temporary injunction issued Saturday night that forbade the IDF from carrying out the planned demolitions – reveals a principled approach that is relevant to other cases liable to arise in the future. This approach holds that someone can be deprived of his right to appeal a planned demolition if the demolition is carried out in the context of actual fighting, or when it derives from "an immediate and definitive military need to prevent a genuine risk to IDF soldiers operating in the region."

This ruling is in accord with the principles laid down in other High Court rulings in 1989 and 1990. In 1989, then-court president Meir Shamgar wrote that a resident must be allowed to appeal the planned demolition of his house before it is carried out, because this is a "fundamental legal right." Nevertheless, he added, there could be military circumstances that would require the demolition to be performed on the spot, such as if "a military operation cannot be delayed," and this would supersede the right of appeal.

The second ruling, written by then-deputy president Menachem Elon in 1990, dealt with a case in which houses in a Gaza refugee camp were demolished without the residents being given a prior right of appeal. The state argued that military necessity required the demolition to be carried out without delay. Elon accepted this argument, given that a soldier had died due to "the narrow, winding conditions of the place, which did not enable the slain [soldier's] life to be protected."

In such circumstances, he said, delaying the demolition would create "a real danger to human life and a genuine fear that execution of the necessary [military] operations would be foiled."

However, Elon continued, even if military necessity justifies an immediate demolition, the army must "take care to minimize the extent of the damage as much as possible… and allow [residents] to voice their objections to authorized parties on the spot."

The court's approach also applies to house demolitions for purposes of deterrence.

The court's rulings must be read in light of the principle of proportionality, a constitutional principle that obligates all government agencies under the 1992 Basic Law on Human Dignity and Liberty. That law states that the IDF or any other agency may violate individual rights only for a "proper purpose" and "to an extent no greater than is required."

And the court upholds this principle even when it exercises judicial restraint and declines to investigate the actual military necessity of the operation in question.

Battles rage in Gaza

More than 30 Palestinians and 13 Israeli soldiers were killed in Gaza last week. Israeli soldiers killed at least 12 Palestinians in Rafah on Thursday.

Heavy fighting was reported Friday between IDF troops on the Philadelphi Route in the southern Gaza Strip and Palestinian gunmen in the adjacent Rafah refugee camp. Earlier, IDF armoured bulldozers began demolishing buildings in the Rafah refugee camp, adjacent to the Philadelphi Route where five soldiers were killed.

Thirteen soldiers killed

The 13 soldiers killed in Gaza were: Yaakov Marvizi of Kibbutz Geva; Adaron Amar of Eilat; Eitan Neuman of Jerusalem; Aviad Deri of Moshav Matta; Kobi Mizrahi of Jerusalem; Ofer Jerbi of Moshav Ben Zakai; Avi Hakani of Ashdod; Lior Vishinski of Ramat Gan; Za'ur Smeilev of Ofakim; Aiman Gadir of Bir Makhsur; Elad Cohen of Jerusalem; Rotem Adam of Rishon Letzion and Alexei Chait of Be'er Sheva.

Sharon thanks Mubarak

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon telephoned Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak last week to thank him for Egypt's help in arranging the return of the remains of six Israeli soldiers held by Palestinian terrorist organizations. He also thanked Mubarak for allowing Israeli army rabbis to search Egyptian territory near Rafah for the remains of five other soldiers killed a day later. In particular, he asked Mubarak to pass on thanks to Omar Suleiman, the head of Egyptian intelligence who did most of the actual mediation to retrieve the body parts from the Palestinians.

UNRWA reacts

The UN Relief and Works Agency, known as UNRWA, urged Palestinian gunmen not to threaten the lives of UNRWA ambulance teams in Gaza after armed Palestinians forced a team to transport three gunmen fighting Israeli forces to a hospital in the city. "UNRWA condemns this action," a statement by the group said. "While its ambulances do not make any distinction between the injured," it said, "at no time and under no circumstances should armed men enter any UNRWA vehicle." Israel, which has been criticized for stopping and searching ambulances, has long charged that Palestinians have been using ambulances to transport terrorists, bombs and weapons.

Grossmann, Elon win prizes

Israeli writers David Grossmann and Amos Elon have won prestigious British literary prizes. Grossmann won the 2004 Jewish Quarterly Wingate award for fiction for his novel Someone to Run With. Elon won the non-fiction award for The Pity of it All: A Portrait of Jews in Germany, 1743-1933.

Was Berg targeted as a Jew?

By JOE BERKOFSKY
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The world may never know for sure if Nicholas Berg's religion played a role in his grisly execution at the hand of terrorists in Iraq.

But many, including his family, are speculating it was a factor in the terrorists' decision to kill the American Jewish civilian who had gone to the wartorn country in search of business.

A video that surfaced on the Internet last Tuesday showed the decapitation by masked Iraqis of Berg, 26, of West Chester, Pa.

The scene echoed the 2002 murder in Pakistan of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, who was forced to admit his Jewishness on tape just before his captors cut off his head.

The killing raises questions about whether a Jewish person – civilian or military – is in any graver danger than anyone else in such a volatile region.

Shoshana Bryen, director of special projects for the Washington-based Jewish Institute for National Security Affairs, said it figures Jews would be targeted in Iraq.

"There are people in these countries who are looking to kill people who are members of certain groups," Bryen said. "The two at the top of the list are Americans and Jews."

Though Berg's religion wasn't mentioned on the video, posted on a website linked to Al Qaeda, Berg cites his family members, similar to the way Pearl did.

Berg is seen saying, "My name is Nick Berg, my father's name is Michael, my mother's name is Susan… I have a brother and sister, David and Sarah."

His father, Michael, who was inundated by reporters Tuesday as his family was still grieving, said his son's religion may have made him a target.

"There's a better chance than not that they knew he was Jewish," his father was quoted saying. "If there was any doubt that they were going to kill him, that probably clinched it, I'm guessing."

His father also told reporters that his son routinely wore a tallit, although he didn't wear it in public.

Joseph Kashnow, an army cavalry scout from Baltimore who has returned from Baghdad, felt strains of anti-Semitism before coming home after a severe injury.

Kashnow, an Orthodox Jew who wore a kippah but usually hid it under his helmet, said that while most of the time his religion wasn't an issue, he did encounter problems.

"It's certainly possible there are people" in Iraq "who would feel it was a 'two-mints-in-one' to get an American and a Jew," Kashnow told JTA.

But not everyone agrees.

Rabbi Mitchell Ackerson, an Orthodox rabbi and senior Jewish chaplain for Operation Iraqi Freedom, just returned to his native Maryland from Iraq after nearly one year there. Despite the killing of a Jewish civilian, he said he believed American soldiers remained the prime target for Iraqis insurgents.

While in Iraq, Rabbi Ackerson never told Jewish soldiers to hide their identities, but neither did he counsel them to "flaunt" their Judaism.

"I'm not sure what happened with Berg, but my gut inclination is he was not killed because he was Jewish. Instead, it was, 'We captured an American, we're going to prove we're the tough guys and we're going to kill him.'"

Rabbi Ackerson said if Berg's murder was religiously motivated, his captors or the Al Qaeda-linked group that claimed responsibility "would've highlighted it," just as they did with Pearl.

Kashnow's right leg was nearly blown off by a homemade land mine last September. He has spent months undergoing operations and therapy, yet he says he's as sure as ever the war is just.

He says Berg's murder should only deepen American and Jewish faith in the war on terrorism. "Berg was fighting to rebuild the country and make it safe for freedom. It's still a tragedy."

Kashnow is not alone.

"Should people think twice or should we continue this?" said Judy Ledger, whose son and daughter and their spouses all served with the U.S. army in Iraq. "You do have to realize there's a danger, but the danger is no more if you're in the military than if there is a hate crime" in the United States.

But Ledger told JTA in an earlier interview that as a mother, her children's Jewishness was always in her mind.

Ledger recalled how when her son, Matt, first went to Iraq before the conflict began, she urged him to remove the word "Jewish" from his military dog tags. But he refused, saying, "I don't want a priest praying over me if I get killed."

Some Jewish officials echoed Kashnow's view that Berg's murder, combined with last Tuesday's videotaped killing of six Israeli soldiers by Palestinians in the Gaza Strip, should deepen the commitment of Jews and other Americans to the war on terrorism.

Southern Sudan doctor joins local doctor in fight to save Sudan

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Dr. Achol Dor wonders at the hypocrisy of a world outraged over human rights abuses in Arab countries but silent over the murder, rape and abduction into slavery of millions of South Sudanese Africans.

Three years ago, in her efforts to raise awareness about the region, she joined B'nai Brith's Black Jewish Dialogue group, where she met Dr. Norman Epstein, who was also enraged by the world's silence over the plight of the South Sudanese.

Their discussions led to the creation of a new grassroots group, Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan (www.geocities.com/castsudan).

Today, Dor says, Israelis and the southern Sudanese are the only ones who understand the real dangers of Arab nationalism.

Dor, 42, moved to Canada in 1995. She spent her early years growing up in Bor, a small village on the banks of the White Nile in southern Sudan, which was wracked by a revolt against the Muslim north in its early years of independence.

As a child, Dor recalls seeing people burning to death inside their homes, afraid to venture outside where soldiers waited to kill them with their guns. The Sudanese army paid regular visits to her family. At six years old, she watched the soldiers rape her older sister and kill her father, who was the chief of her village.

"They tortured him before stabbing him to death," Dor said. "We weren't allowed to bury my father and he lay outside. We had to watch his body being eaten by birds.

"My father could have escaped because he knew the army was coming. But he was afraid the soldiers would burn our village if he ran away," said Dor, who is Dinka, a southern Sudanese tribe regularly victimized by government soldiers and the Arab Janjaweed militia from the north.

South Sudanese villagers, who are mainly Christian animists, have been accused of hiding members of the Sudan People's Liberation Army (SPLA), a rebel militia fighting for greater independence from the Arabic speaking Islamic government in Khartoum. Conflict has existed between the two groups since Sudan's independence in 1956, despite an agreement they signed in 1972.

Dr. Achol Dor

"My father didn't know the army would come back later and burn the village anyway," Dor said dryly.

Before he died, Dor's father made her mother promise to send Achol to school.

"My mother did everything she could to help me pursue an education," said Dor, who was encouraged to finish high school and go to medical school at the University of Cairo in Egypt.

From there she got a job at the Khartoum University Hospital, where she was ostracized for being a black African from the south and for helping south Sudanese refugees. After being warned of her imminent arrest, she fled to Owar, a refugee camp at the Sudanese-Kenyan border before making her way to Greece and then Canada.

During those years, Dor volunteered as a doctor to help Sudanese victims of hostilities that broke out again in 1983, leaving an estimated two million people dead and five million homeless.

Upon her arrival in Canada, she began speaking out in order to overcome the international community's ignorance and indifference to the plight of her people.

"This is a war based on ethnicity, not religion," Dor said. "Otherwise, the Arab government would accept the African Muslims that live in Darfur, but they are also being victimized."

Dor is convinced western politicians are silent over the atrocities committed in southern Sudan because the Arab world has oil and money.

"And the other Arab countries rally around northern Sudan because they protect themselves," she said.

Today, Epstein said, Canadians Against Slavery and Torture in Sudan is pursuing a three-pronged approach to increase public knowledge of the struggles of the south Sudanese community. It advocates on behalf of slaves in Sudan as well as raises awareness of the civil war. The group also gives lectures at schools and writes members of parliament.

Norman Epstein

However, despite the fact that current peace talks in Khartoum indicate that the Sudanese government is open to to international pressure, Epstein believes his efforts to convince the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the urgency of the situation have been dismissed.

Epstein, who is an emergency medical doctor, believes more needs to be done to force the Sudanese government to allow humanitarian aid into the country.

Reports from Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch indicate that abuses continue around Darfur. Accounts filed by these organizations and UN foot soldiers are being suppressed by the United Nations Human Rights Commission, where Sudan is a member, Epstein said.

Over the past few years, Epstein warned that the rising level of human rights abuses, the growth of the slave trade and the number of refugees languishing in camps, would result in a devastating humanitarian crisis.

"In the meantime, peace talks in the south are silencing the world while the war continues to kill and enslave people on the other front."

"If we don't act now, in 10 years we will regret the opportunity that we had to intervene," Epstein said.

Toronto teen places second in International Bible Competition

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — Yoni Halpern, 17, was among four Canadian teens to participate in this year's International Bible Competition (Chidon Ha'Tanach Ha'Olami) on Israel's Independence Day at the Jerusalem Theatre.

The other Canadian teens were Daniel Gutenberg from Toronto, Sigal Samuel from Montreal and Paeir Barzilai from Vancouver.

Halpern, a former student at Toronto's Bnei Akiva school Yeshivat Or Chaim, has been a student at Yeshivat Chorev in Jerusalem since September.

He placed second among 55 students aged 14 to 18 from 27 different countries around the world who participated in the final round of the quiz.

The quiz was overseen by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, Minister of Education Limor Livnat and Jewish Agency chair Sallai Meridor, and was televised live on Israeli Channel 1.

"It was quite an incredible experience," says Halpern, whose family moved to the Bacca neighbourhood in Jerusalem last year to enable his parents, both doctors, to volunteer at hospitals in Jerusalem.

"I was proud to represent Canada," says Halpern, although he said he felt slightly torn between representing his Canadian alma mater and his Israeli school, where the international champion, 16-year-old David Tsuru, is a student.

"It was strange for me because I have spent the last year living in Israel," says Halpern. "Half the time I felt like I was representing Canada and half the time I felt like I was representing Israel."

"I am going back to Canada in June and I'm not so happy about it," he says, adding that he intends to make aliyah once he has finished his studies in Canada.

"I feel like less of a minority in Israel," he says. "This is my homeland and I feel that Israel is where I belong."

Amos Hermon, chair of the Jewish Agency's education department, says the primary purpose of holding the two-week Bible camp preceding the competition is to promote Zionist values.

"It is an amazing meeting between Jewish youth from around the world," he says.

For Halpern, this was the most rewarding part of the whole experience. "Meeting Jews from around the world was both the most challenging and most worthwhile aspect of the event. I met friends that I will definitely keep," he says.

"Although we each came from a different area of the world, we all had something in common and that made me realize that I am truly part of a Jewish nation."

The competition's other primary objective is to interest Jewish students around the world in the study of the Bible.

"For us, the competition is the best tool to increase the love of the Bible among Jewish students around the world," says Hermon.

He says that through the Jewish Agency's 500 permanent and 2,500 short-term shlichim who are sent around the world to organize the event's regional and national level competitions, the Jewish Agency succeeds in bringing a total of 9,000 to 10,000 Jewish students to try out for the big event, which includes questions on all 24 books.

Each year, the top scorers from Montreal, Vancouver and Toronto, plus the national second-placer get to participate in the international level contest.

"It has become really popular in Canada," says Halpern, who says at least 10 to 15 students from Yeshivat Or Chaim and sister school Ulpanat Orot try to qualify.

"I think I have encouraged a lot more of my friends in Toronto to enter next year," says Halpern, who has placed seventh in the nationals since Grade 6.

"It used to be impossible for someone from outside of Israel to get as far as I did," he says.

In the last few years, the Jewish Agency has tried to expand the competition's mandate to include non-religious schoolchildren.

"We are doing our best to encourage community and Reform schools to participate" says Hermon, who intends to provide secular school principals with the materials and assistance necessary to prepare their students for next year's competition.

"Our most important objective is to encourage studies among non-religious schools, too.

"There is not enough emphasis put on the Bible in a lot of Jewish circles, and as a result, there are a large number of Jews who don't know our history. But the history of our people is something I think every Jew should know."

Two Powerful Strategies for Seniors (part 1)

S. Jonathan Kirshblum,
B.A., CFP, FMA, FCSI
Financial Planner
Investment & Insurance
Advisor

What is the likelihood of finding a guaranteed investment that could potentially pay the equivalent of 10% income yearly? What about the likelihood of finding a way to participate in all of the potential upside of the stock market while still enjoying a principle guarantee? For many seniors, there are two strategies that can achieve these goals. One strategy focuses on providing investors high levels of guaranteed income, while the second is tailored for individuals interested in growth potential. Part one of this column reviews the income strategy.

Strategy 1 - "The Insured Annuity"

The insured annuity is a strategy that involves two insurance products: a prescribed life annuity and permanent life insurance. Both products are purchased in equal amounts and using non-registered monies (i.e. money held outside of an RRSP or RRIF). For some people, the result of such a coordinated effort may be a healthy stream of lifetime income as well as capital preservation for the benefit of loved ones.

Permanent life insurance provides coverage for a person's entire life; it never expires nor does it ever require renewal. Individuals pay premiums for a policy, and the amount for which one is insured, known as the death benefit, is paid to named beneficiaries when the insured dies. Premiums for life insurance are determined by a combination of factors including a person's age, gender, smoking habits and health, as determined by a required medical examination.

With a life annuity an individual provides a lump sum of money up front to an insurance company, and in return, receives a lifetime of guaranteed income. A "prescribed" annuity is a type of life annuity that receives favourable tax treatment, a valuable benefit to people in a higher tax bracket.

How does it Work?

The insured annuity concept combines the benefits of permanent life insurance with those of a prescribed life annuity. During an individual's lifetime, he or she receives a guaranteed income from the annuity. A portion of the annuity income is used to pay the insurance premiums and income tax, and, when the individual dies, the death benefit is paid out to named heirs.

For example, let's consider the case of Mr. Jones. He is 75 years old, in reasonably good health and in the top marginal tax bracket. He has $500,000 to invest and would like to maximize his income without risking any of his capital. Seeking higher returns than the 3 or 4% currently offered by GICs, Mr. Jones finds the ideal solution in an insured annuity.

Mr. Jones purchases a permanent life insurance policy for $500,000, which costs $26,000 per year in premiums. He then buys a $500,000 prescribed life annuity using non-registered funds; in return, he is guaranteed a lifetime income of $61,000 per year. The tax owing on this income is $8,000 per year, given the favourable tax treatment prescribed annuities offer. He pays the insurance premiums and taxes from the annuity income and nets $27,000 per year for the rest of his life. This is a substantial increase in yearly after-tax income compared to the 4% GIC alternative; in fact, he would need to find a GIC paying 10% in order to generate a similar return. Upon Mr. Jones' passing, $500,000 is paid to his named beneficiaries tax-free and likely avoiding probate.

Who can Benefit?

There are three considerations when determining the income potential of this strategy: the cost of insurance, the amount of income offered by the annuity and an individual's marginal tax rate. With these issues in mind, the insured annuity strategy may provide the best financial value to people above age 70, who are in good health and are in the highest tax bracket.

As set out above, the insured annuity can be a powerful income strategy with added estate benefits. It is available to individuals, or couples on a joint-last-to-die basis. In some situations, corporate monies can be used to fund the arrangement. An investor who wishes to generate lifetime income while preserving an estate for beneficiaries should consult an insurance-licensed advisor on whether insured annuities should be included in their overall financial plan.

Pottery power

Seniors mold talents at the Betel Centre

What's the difference between pottery and ceramics? After two years of pottery classes at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living, Judy Schneiderman says there's a world of difference.

In ceramics you decorate finished "greenware" pieces, Judy says, but pottery is a do-it-yourself art, starting with blank clay and ending with a rainbow of creative and functional vases, bowls, candle holders and other pieces.

"It's really enticing," she says of her class, leaning over a handmade vase she is decorating in a butterfly motif. "You don't realize it, but you really make a lot of progress."

Ruth Sonenberg took a ceramics class in Florida years ago, but wasn't interested. Then, with the help of patient instructors in Florida and at the Betel Centre, she discovered pottery and clay sculpture.

"When I started, instead of Ruth, I signed Rivka, because I wasn't proud of what was coming out," she says. Now, 14 years later, Ruth's free-flowing, earthy, multi-hued sculptures appear prominently in a display case at the front entrance of the Betel Centre. She also donates pieces for fundraising raffles.

"It makes me feel good that it's benefiting the Centre ... it has been a godsend ...within walking distance, and lets me mingle with people I like."

Elly Friedman also loves the ambience of pottery classes at the Betel Centre. "We're like one big happy family," she says; there is always an instructor present and experienced students help those who are newer to the class.

She was hooked two years ago after seeing a few classes, and has now made two Seder plates and a menorah, and is working on an elegant three-piece strawberry bowl set in summery tones. "I look forward to it every week," she says. "I can't wait to get here."

Jennie Berke is an experienced hand, with 20 years of pottery under her belt, eight of them at Betel Centre. Though Jennie has created many whimsical and artistic pieces, her pottery lately has tended toward the practical. Today she is rolling the rough rectangles and strips of clay that will become a set of sink organizers for a daughter-in-law.

Jennie originally joined the Betel Centre following eye surgery and was looking for classes closer to home so she wouldn't have to drive. And pottery was just the beginning. One thing that surprised Jennie was Tuesday-afternoon Line Dancing classes, which are free to Betel Centre members.

"I didn't go for a long time. I thought, 'yuck.' " She's still amazed by how much she enjoys it. "It's the best form of exercise," she says. Between art, exercise and computer classes, Jennie says she's at the Centre every day. But pottery is still her highlight.

Beverly Goldberg, a five-year pottery student, enjoys the meditative aspects of working with clay. "It's like therapy," she says. "Whatever I have on my mind, I forget for the time I'm in here."

That's what Ruth Sonenberg has also observed in her years at the Betel Centre.

"I've seen people who are sick, and the time they spend (in pottery) just forgetting about themselves is so important," she says. Though her own hands are painfully arthritic, she believes in "working with the clay ... you don't give in to the pain, you let the pain work for you."

Whether creating functional pieces or free-flowing sculpture, there's something powerful about pottery. "Once you get the bug you can't stop," Ruth says. "The moment our hands touch that clay, something happens ... I never know what I'm going to make until my hands hit the clay."

One Glen Park is the premier condominium address in one of the city's most desirable neighbourhoods. From the elegant front door it is a short walk to Shaarei Shomayim, Torath Emeth and many of the area's kosher restaurants, bakeries and food stores.

But it is the distinctive architecture and stunning, spacious interiors that make One Glen Park truly special.

A fireplace in the lobby is your first indication that the residences here are beyond the ordinary. Featuring 9' high ceilings, coffered foyers with cornice mouldings and oversize layouts, the suites at One Glen Park are simply extraordinary. As well, you'll enjoy an abundance of marble, limestone and hardwood flooring and other top-of-the-line features and finishes.

If the suites at One Glen Park are spectacular, then the penthouses are beyond description. Created by Gluckstein Design, they are quintessential city mansions-in-the-sky, featuring 10' ceilings, sumptuous Bellini kitchens and a plethora of delicious "extras" that only a designer of Mr. Gluckstein's stature and sensitivity could bring to life.

All residences at One Glen Park have generous balconies that make life outdoors enjoyable the minute spring arrives. As well, One Glen Park has a long list of amenities, including a health facility, wave pool, fitness area, sauna and reception/entertaining room. There are two elevators, one of which is designed as a Sabbath elevator.

Often a grand porte cochere entrance, such as the one at One Glen Park, is the high point of a building's design; here it is just the beginning of a wonderful luxurious lifestyle.

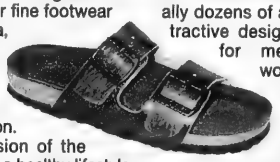
Footprint-in-the-sand comfort makes Naots a natural for camp

Every year, your camp checklist grows. You want to make sure your children have the best of everything, that everything fits, and that nothing hurts.

If a pair of jeans is too tight, you can let them out. If the shoes don't fit perfectly, however, you've got a real camp-killer of a problem on your hands ... er, feet.

Enter Naots. In a healthy body, every part counts — none more so than your feet, which bear the weight of your entire body as you move through the day. Happy, comfortable feet are one of the keys to overall well-being. This is particularly true in the camp environment, with its exposure to varying terrain. If their footwear isn't up to the task, they can't very well run out to a shoe store to rectify the problem.

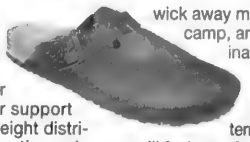
Since 1990 Solemates has graced Canadian feet of all ages with exquisitely fashionable, ruggedly-constructed, hand-sewn NAOT sandals, shoes and boots — all made with pride on Kibbutz Naot Mordechai in Israel. At Solemates' flagship Prairie Dog store on Eglinton Avenue West and at other fine footwear retailers across Canada, the Naot line has soared in popularity to the point where it is now synonymous with foot comfort and fashion.



As a natural extension of the ever-growing interest in a healthy lifestyle "from the ground up", the newly expanded Prairie Dog now houses FitSpirit, a fitness centre equipped with free weights and exercise machines. Personal training is offered in a variety of exercise techniques, including osteoporosis prevention and therapy through general body and back strengthening. The centre is run by Corinne's daughter Natasha, a kinesiologist.

Quality and styling. Naots are rugged and long-wearing, with multi-layered cork and latex insoles and durable Eva rubber soles. The selection of styles, colours and patterns has grown each year, and now includes literally dozens of attractive designs for men, women and children. Fashion mavenism has become increasingly prevalent among the young set, and the Flexy line of sandals, shoes and clogs will address all of your children's gourmet fashion tastes.

A perfect match of form and function, Naot footwear is designed on the principle of a "footprint in the sand". For proper support and weight distribution, the sole molds itself to your foot in much the same way sand does when you stand barefoot on a warm summer beach.



Naots' removable cork footbed allows you to insert orthotics, but for many people, the footbed itself is adequate support. Moreover, you can replace the footbed without replacing the shoe, further extending the life of what is already an enduring product.

Leaving no element of foot comfort overlooked, Naot has a brand new offering that's both funky and functional: socks with dedicated left and right feet! Reinforced heels and soles give metatarsal and arch support, and foot-friendly fibres wick away moisture. Just perfect for camp, and an easy way to eliminate sock woes once and for all. Naot shoes and sandals are pure heaven for walking on any terrain; on the beach or off, you'll feel your footprint in the sand.

Solemates and Naot have grown by creating products that earn long-term customer loyalty, of a kind that goes far beyond traditional brand loyalty. MADE IN ISRAEL, always symbolic of quality and cleverness, now means hip as well, and resonates with people everywhere who revere and respect the "little country that could."

Weizmann and Sick Kids studying genetic disease

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

New research being carried out at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot and at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children aims to understand and prevent genetic diseases and the suffering they cause.

At a recent program held at the Ontario Science Centre, researchers and doctors from Weizmann and the Hospital for Sick Children came together to discuss some of this new research. The evening was sponsored by The Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, in conjunction with the Robinson Family Institute of Jewish Learning, the Hospital for Sick Children and the National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, as well as by a donation from the estate of the late Louis Ugar.

Taking part in the program were Anthony Futerman of Weizmann's department of biological chemistry; Joe Clarke, the director of the genetic metabolic diseases program at the Hospital for Sick Children; Annette Feigenbaum, a researcher in the division of clinical and metabolic genetics at the Hospital for Sick Children; and Don Mahuran, senior scientist at the Hospital for Sick Children's research institute.

Moderator was Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, spiritual leader of Chabad@Flamingo.

Futerman said one of the main problems with the current research being carried out by Weizmann and Sick Kids is that while we may know what happens when a gene malfunctions, we don't know how it occurs.

Some therapeutic options being studied, he said, include replacing affected genes and defective enzymes.

Mahuran said Weizmann and Sick Kids are studying chemical chaperone therapy, drug therapy that blocks or changes how biochemical processes work.

They are also researching the adult version of Tay-Sachs disease, which is very rare. While the therapy appears promising, Mahuran said, it is necessary to determine what the most effective dose is, as well as the lifelong effects of a particular drug. If the researchers find that chemical chaperone therapy works for adult onset Tay-Sachs, they believe it may work with other similar disorders.

While most genetic diseases can strike any ethnic group, diseases such as Tay-Sachs, Gaucher and Niemann-Pick Type A tend to appear in Jews, especially among Ashkenazim.

All of these diseases leave the body unable to metabolize certain enzymes. Niemann-Pick is a severe neurological disease in which there is progressive loss of early motor skills, mental retardation and abdominal enlargement. Death usually occurs by three years of age. With Tay-Sachs, there is also loss of motor skills. The child becomes blind, paralyzed and is unaware of his or her surroundings. Death occurs by age five.

Gaucher disease can begin at any age and is characterized by anemia, easy bruising, bone pain, bleeding and fractures.

These illnesses are caused by recessive genes, meaning that both parents must carry them. One in four of their children will have the disease, and two will be carriers. If only one parent has the gene, each child has a 50-50 chance of being a carrier.

Feigenbaum said there are screening programs for some of these conditions, as well as for others such as familial dysautonomia, cystic fibrosis and Canavan disease. Screening for Tay-Sachs has been available in Ontario for more than 25 years, and as a result, she said, the incidence of Tay-Sachs in the Ashkenazi Jewish population has been reduced by 90 per cent.

Testing is not available for Gaucher disease in Toronto, she said, because the majority of adults who have it show no symptoms, and the infantile form is very rare.

Feigenbaum said in order for a mass screening program to be established, there must be a high frequency of carriers in a particular population, the effects of the disease must be clinically significant and predictable, and the test must be available, reasonably priced and simple to give.

Screening is used not only to prevent the disease from occurring, she said. It can reassure couples who fear giving birth to an affected child. It also allows for family planning as well as early treatment if it is available, and it helps the research process.

If there is a family history of the disease, OHIP will pay for the tests, Feigenbaum said. They are also available at American labs, but "without proper genetic counselling, the couple won't know what to do with the results."

Dental fraternity honours director of CDA Pulver

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Dr. Wayne Pulver, the director of the Canadian Dental Association, was recently presented with the highest award of the Alpha Omega Toronto Alumni Chapter in recognition of his years of service to the chapter, to the dentistry profession and to the Jewish community.

Dr. Wayne Pulver

Pulver is the ninth recipient of the dental fraternal organization's Achievement Award. In his acceptance speech, he talked of his work in dentistry, saying, "Interestingly enough, it never seemed to be a hardship – rather a labour of love."

A 1973 graduate of the University of Toronto's Faculty of Dentistry, Pulver, 55, maintains a private endodontic practice. He is the head of the endodontic section of Mount Sinai Hospital.

He is the holder of numerous fellowships, and has served in many posts, including as president of Alpha Omega Undergraduate PI Chapter, as president of the Toronto Alumni Chapter of Alpha Omega, the Canadian Academy of Endodontics and the Ontario Dental Association, as governor of the Canadian Dental Association and as regent of Alpha Omega International.

In 2003, he received a service award from the Ontario Dental Association. He has also received honours from the American Association of Endodontists, Omicrom Kappa Upsilon and U of T's Faculty of Dentistry, which cited him as an alumnus of distinction in 2001.

Pulver is also active in a number of Jewish charitable organizations including the Jewish National Fund and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

He and his wife Marlene are members of Holy Blossom Temple. They have three children: Elise, a lawyer at Goodman and Carr; Shawn, who just graduated in law at the University of Western Ontario; and Steven, who just completed his first year at Western.

Israeli documentary filmmaker tackles topical and historical themes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Although Benny Brunner has lived in Amsterdam, Holland, as "a Diaspora Israeli" for the past 18 years, Israel's political scene still engages and inspires him as a filmmaker.

Three of Brunner's documentaries – The Children of Abraham & Sophie, The Wall and It is No Dream – were screened at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Broadcast by television stations in Israel and throughout Europe, they are both topical and historical.

The Children of Abraham & Sophie, an intriguing film about the power of memory, is about an unusual Israeli family, the Brauns. Its deceased patriarch, Abraham-Braun, immigrated to Palestine from Germany in 1924 with his wife, Sophie Schopf, a Catholic convert to Judaism.

The Brauns had three sons and the youngest, Mordechai Bar-On, was Moshe Dayan's chief of staff in the 1950s and, subsequently, the Israeli army's chief education officer.

Bar-On's daughter married an Israeli Arab, Daher Zedeini, whose ancestors were high Ottoman officials in the Galilee. Zedeini's anti-Zionist beliefs clash with those of Bar-On's, but the pair, nevertheless, are on civil terms. Zedeini's children are torn between their Jewish and Arab identities.

In The Wall, Brunner explores the controversial security fence Israel is currently building through the West Bank and around Jerusalem.

Israel's biggest civil engineering project in its history, the barrier is an affront to Palestinians and some Israelis, but a necessity to the Israeli official in charge of its construction.

It Is No Dream, whose title is an ironic play on words by Zionist ideologue Theodor Herzl, is a critical examination of Israel's 37-year occupation of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Through the eyes of left-wing Israeli writers, human rights workers, artists and intellectuals, Israel's policies in the territories come under sharp scrutinty.

Brunner, 49, was born in Romania. He was brought to Israel at the age of five and raised in Be'er Sheva. He served in the army for three years, participating in the 1973 Yom Kippur War. Then he studied film and television at Tel Aviv University.

Benny Brunner

He left Israel in 1986 to "kick-start" his career and take a break from the intensity of Israeli politics. He intended to return after a year, but stayed after he fell in love with a woman and his career took off.

He made The Children of Abraham & Sophie after meeting Bar-On, who had appeared in one of his earlier films, Al Nakba: The Palestinian Catastrophe 1948, a documentary about the Palestinian refugee problem.

"I was mesmerized by Bar-On's story," Brunner explained.

He spent three weeks filming The Wall, which documents the detrimental impact of the fence on ordinary Palestinians. "It's not a temporary measure," he claimed. "It's a political border, and there to stay."

Brunner plans to make a sequel that will focus on the lives of half a dozen Palestinians in eastern Jerusalem affected by the route of the fence.

To him, the barrier is a metaphor for Israel's "walled mentality" since the 1967 Six Day War.

It Is No Dream was "born out of necessity." He regards it as "a protest" against Israeli settlements in the territories and Israel's occupation apparatus – the check points, the curfews and so on.

"Israel has a master-slave relationship with the Palestinians," he said.

Brunner, who has no faith whatsoever in Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's policies, fears the occupation is destroying Israel's moral fibre.

On the other hand, he is not sure whether Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority, is a sincere interlocutor and can be trusted.

Brunner, who began moving to the left when he was a soldier, is pessimistic about the prospects for peace.

"There is nothing on the horizon to support optimism that an Arab-Israeli accommodation is possible," said Brunner, who backs Yossi Beilin's two-state Geneva Accord and Ami Ayalon's and Sari Nusseibeh's The People's Voice initiative.

"I can't see a political solution. International intervention is the only hope."

Currently, Brunner is working on a ground-breaking documentary dealing with Arab attitudes toward the Holocaust.

The Arabs generally perceive the Holocaust as a fairy tale and as a tool Israel uses against them in their mutual propaganda war, said Brunner, who plans to interview Arab decision-makers in Egypt, Jordan and Lebanon.

He is saddened by the fact that fervent anti-Semitism is sweeping through the Arab world. But he thinks this anti-Semitic wave is mainly the noxious fallout of the Arab-Israeli dispute.

"Take the conflict away and these attitudes will largely disappear."

Brunner, who nine years ago made a two-part movie about Israelis and the Holocaust, is planning to direct his first feature film.

An "existential thriller," it would be a sequel to The Avengers, a 1996 10-minute short turning on Jewish partisans who tried to kill six million Germans in retribution for the Holocaust.

Taking off from where The Avengers ended, Brunner's film revolves around a plot by two of their overzealous descendants to close the circle and wreak apocalyptic revenge on Germany.

Contact 2004

A unique exhibition combining music and photography continues until May 23 at the Mill St. Brewery, Toronto.

Part of Toronto's Contact 2004 Photography Festival, the exhibition features the works of the "Group of Six" Joanne de Boehmler, Fabio Dorigato, Aurora Galluzzo, Geoff Gilmore, Josefina Nadurata and Susanne Schlomer.

Music and photography come together to reveal contrasting aspects of life and bring out the highs and lows of each musical note and each person's life.

Dorigato, an Italian diplomat currently living in Berlin, served in Toronto between 1997 and 2002. His photographs are part of a series of over 400 images shot between October 2003 and February 2004 in Auschwitz, Buchenwald and other concentration camps.

"My personal effort is aimed to raise awareness, especially among young generatiions that haven't experienced the Holocaust, of the fact that the more our memories of past tragic events fade, the higher the risk becomes that history repeats itself," Dorigato said. "Unfortunately the theme of my contribution to the show seems to have been confirmed by recent events in Montreal and Toronto.

"Through the combination of photographs shot in several concentration camps and the music of Polish composer Henryk Gorecki, I have tried to go beyond simple historical documents and find a format in order to reach the interest and the conscience of a wider and younger public," he says.

Mill St. Brewery, Distillery District, 55 Mill St., Building 63, Toronto. Until May 23. Call 416-681-0338.

Moms like me
Is offering a new 6 week program starting June 2nd
Stroller Dance
• The best new way to stay fit, meet new moms and feel great about yourself and your body.
• Classes include HipHop, Jazz, music from Musical Theatre (Chicago, Hair Spray etc.) and Ballet technique that help tone the body.
• Meet new moms in a supportive environment.
• All classes are done outdoors.
• No dance experience needed!
• A baby and a stroller required.
After having a baby 10 weeks ago I couldn't bring myself to workout, I didn't have the energy or the time with a new baby. I found the only way to feel great about myself was to feel the freedom of dance again. I have danced professionally now for 10 years and knew there had to be a way to share this passion with my new baby and other moms. I incorporated the stroller and my baby into the choreography. I have never had so much fun and felt so great about my body and especially myself. I now want to share my secret with new moms like myself.

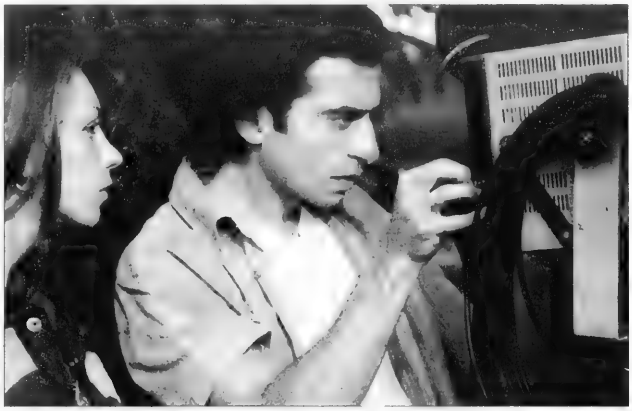
Filmmaker's works are an 'assault to the senses'

By CARRIE BRODI
Special to The CJN



Richard Yagutilov on the set of one of his films.

While studying film in Toronto, Richard Yagutilov was asked to change a sequence in Numb, an experimental drama he made about the silent interactions that take place between passengers on a city bus.

At one point in the film, a black character hits a white character. His teacher thought the scene might be viewed as being racially biased.

Yagutilov refused and the film went on to win the grand prize at the Niagara Independent Film Festival in 2001.

"I just figure if I'm already affecting people, than I'm probably on the right track," he says.

Only 27, he has already completed five short films and won three awards at film festivals in Ontario and the United States.

He received his latest award, the Gold Remi Award for Directing, at WorldFest-Houston International Film Festival, for Park Pleasures, a five-minute short about a lovers' quarrel. Another film, I Hate, a short monologue about a man dealing with loss, love and hate, won the Best Achievement Award from the International Television Association in 2000.

Recently back from festivals in Houston and Palm Beach, Yagutilov is broke but happy, having made valuable connections in the industry. There he faced his fear of public speaking at an audience Q&A.

Not a natural born schmoozer, he is slowly learning the art of self-promotion.

"I don't like to hype things before they exist," Yagutilov says, "But I realize that this industry is all about getting people excited about what you're doing before you do it, so that they get behind your project."

His phone rings at the beginning of our interview. The film union he works for is calling him in for a night of rigging lights and laying cable. He declines.

"It's OK," he says. "They will call again. I'm not ready to work tonight anyway."

Instead he wants to talk about his work and the ideas he has that keep him awake at night. Like the vision he had the other day for a feature film about a spiritually despondent man who goes to the desert to find God, or a comedy about the fights and flirtations that take place amongst a disparate group of diners in a restaurant.

"One of my biggest challenges is crystallizing and developing the many disassociated images I have," he says. "Because writing doesn't come easy to me, I try to communicate these visions through the camera and through sound."

He describes his films as "an assault to the senses" akin to the work of directors he admires like Ridley Scott (Blade Runner) and Oliver Stone (Natural Born Killers). Stone, he says, was the first to explore a character's internal monologue through quick flashcuts and over-laid dialogue.

"Movies like Natural Born Killers leave you no choice but to be in the movie and inside the character's head," he says. "The hallucinogenic, dreamlike sequences in Oliver Stone's The Doors, showed me what you could do with film. Getting a glimpse into other people's creativity in that way is a spiritual experience for me."

Yagutilov knew early what he wanted to do. Born in the southern Caucasus region of Russia, his family moved to Israel and then New York by the time he was 11. Living in Brooklyn near Coney Island in the late '80s was a dangerous time, he says.

"I remember being mugged at knife point at 11 or 12. All I did in New York was stay at home and watch movies or go to the movie theatre. That's when I knew that this is what I wanted to do," he says.

He boasts that his films are made out of nothing: donated film and equipment (even a donated bus from the TTC for Numb), the expertise of friends, and his father's knowledge of steel and plastics to concoct innovative camera apparatuses to achieve his vision of a given scene.

But he's always on the lookout for people to fund his work.

"Mastercard is financing my stuff right now," he says. "But in my experience, that old adage, ask and you shall receive, knock, and the door will be opened, has been so true."

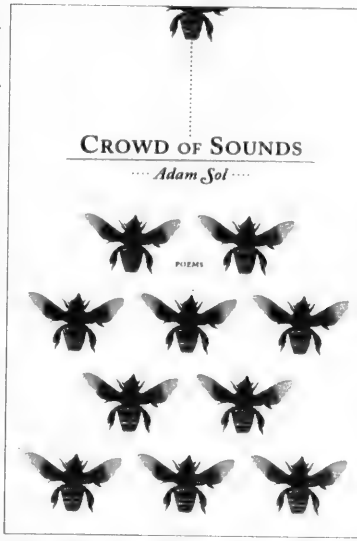
TORONTO POET ADAM SOL WINS $10,000 TRILLIUM PRIZE

Toronto Jewish poet Adam Sol, whose poetry volume Crowd of Sounds has been called "a breathtaking insight into the ragged and beautiful condition of the world," has won the province's $10,000 Trillium Award for poetry. His publisher, the House of Anansi Press, also receives $2,000.

Sol was one of five Trillium winners named earlier this month by Ontario Minister of Culture Madeleine Meilleur and the chair of the Ontario Media Development Corporation, Marcelle Lean. Prizes are awarded for books and poetry in both French and English.

* * *

More Award Winners: Winnipeg historian Abraham J. Arnold has won the 2004 Distinguished Service Award from the Association for Canadian Jewish Studies for his lifetime contributions to the study and documentation of the Canadian Jewish experience. Born in Montreal in 1922, Arnold was the founding director of the Jewish Historical Society of Western Canada, a founding member of the Canadian Jewish Historical Society, and an editor, journalist and community service representative by profession. A recipient of an honorary degree from the University of Winnipeg in 2001, Arnold was also appointed to the Order of Canada earlier this year. The award is to be given out at the organization's conference in Winnipeg beginning May 30.



The Association of Jewish Libraries has named Avotaynu Publishers, Inc. of New Jersey the winner of its Judaica Bibliography and Reference Book Award in the category of One-Time Body of Work. Avotaynu founders Dr. Sallyann Sack and Gary Mokotoff were honoured for their efforts in helping "to grow Jewish genealogy" by publishing excellent reference tools for people interested in researching their Jewish roots.

Cheryl Landy, who has worn various hats as theatrical stage manager, production manager, producer and fundraiser since 1977, was awarded a Harold Award last week to celebrate her "outstanding contribution to the arts, either on or off stage." Named in memory of the late theatre lover Harold Kandel, the Harolds honour 13 people each year who have made outstanding contributions to the theatre. Landy, who received an individualized pin, was a labour relations specialist for the Professional Association of Canadian Theatres for nearly a decade, and set up a technical theatre training program for Theatre Ontario; she also works part time as cultural services co-ordinator for the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. To what does she attribute her love of theatre? "Probably my mother, who took me to the theatre as a child in South Africa," she replied, adding that she felt "thrilled and absolutely honoured" to be a Harold recipient.

* * *

Yetnikoff recalls meeting Bob Dylan and various of his relatives for a late dinner in the '70s, during which the poet's mother, Mrs. Zimmerman, tried to get her son to eat more because he was just "skin and bones." After Dylan told his mother to stop fussing over him, Yetnikoff asked Mrs. Zimmerman if he was always so much trouble. "Bobby? God forbid," she replied. "Bobby gives me such naches. He's a good boy, a regular mensch. He calls, he writes, he listens to his mother. Every mother should have such a son."

Howling At the Moon also offers many colourful glimpses of Jackie Onassis, Barbra Streisand, Mick Jagger, Billy Joel and other celebs.

FAIRMONT HOTELS AND RESORTS OFFERS LUXURY MOUNTAIN TOUR THROUGH ICEFIELDS PARKWAY

Cruisin' the Canadian Rockies, a drive-it-yourself road trip offered by Fairmont Hotels and Resorts, Mountain Properties, takes in Banff, Lake Louise, Jasper and some of the world's best mountain scenery along Alberta's famed Icefields Parkway (Highway 93).

The six-night, all-inclusive package includes luxurious accommodation and two-night stays at the Fairmont Banff Springs, Fairmont Chateau Lake Louise, and Fairmont Jasper Park Lodge. It also features three gourmet meals a day plus various activities en route that encourage travellers to enjoy their surroundings.

The Icefields Parkway in Banff and Jasper National Parks is the only route between Lake Louise and Jasper. It lies about 45 minutes west of Banff, 2½ hours west of Calgary. Majestic mountains, spectacular valleys, ice-age-old glaciers and wildlife such as elk, bears and moose may be seen along the way.

The package starts at $450 per person per night, not including car rental. It is available from June 15 through Sept. 15. Reservations, 800-441-1414. Website, www fairmont.com.

Anyone visiting this glorious part of Canada may want to bring along a copy of the newly revised 4th edition of Ulysses Travel Guide Western Canada ($29.95), available in many bookstores.

Adventure Travel, Israeli Style: For travellers seeking adventure abroad, Israel is a wonderland of diverse geographical zones that provide terrain for activities ranging from mountain biking to rafting, tubing and kayaking. The Israel Government Tourist Office in Canada recommends these adventure activities:

• Rappel, rock climb and zip line on Israel's mountain ranges, dramatic cliff faces and rocky ravines. Experience a cool weather climb on the slopes of Mt. Hermon, rappel from the great walls of the Ramon Crater under the Negev sun, or zip line down the Manara Cliffs for breathtaking views of Israel's Hula Valley, Golan Heights and the Sea of Galilee.

• Israel offers spectacular diving. Explore submerged ancient Roman streets at underwater archeological sites in the Mediterranean, or stunning coral castles populated with rainbows of tropical sea life off the Red Sea port of Eilat.

• Hiking and trekking destinations include the Banias waterfall, the magnificent Ein Gedi area in the Judean desert and the Israel Trail that spans the country from north to south.

• The most popular spots for horseback riding are the Golan Heights and the Upper Galilee, which offer rolling green hills, ferny forests and water-washed wadis. In the Negev, visitors may go by camel to experience the rugged terrain, multi-coloured canyons and rare wildlife.

• Highly popular jeep tours offer relaxed sightseeing or fast-paced off-road adventure and wild dune buggy excursions. Whether up in the mountains and hills of the Galilee and Golan, or down in the Judean and Negev wadis and ravines, these four-wheel drive tours rarely disappoint.

• With its natural beauty, diverse culture and rich history, Israel is a great place to enjoy by bicycle, and many biking trails have been established throughout the country.

• The Jordan River is not large but it offers many options for inner-tubing, rafting and kayaking, particularly in its northern sections where it flows from the foothills of Mt. Hermon and south into the Galilee.

• In Israel, one of the premier spots in the world for archeology, there are always a variety of digs seeking volunteers to help uncover pieces of the past.

For details, contact the IGTO at 416-964-3784, ext. 22.

Irma Stern Exhibition: Thirty-four works, oils and pastels, on loan from the Irma Stern Museum and the South African National Gallery form the basis of the exhibition Portraits by Irma Stern, on view at the South African Jewish Museum in Johannesburg. The show also features biographical displays and audio interviews.

One of South Africa's most prodigious artists, Stern's reputation as a major artist has grown since her death nearly 40 years ago. She painted portraits of people whose faces intrigued her and who were enticed to pose for her. She did not accept commissions. Her subjects were friends and family, famous personalities and strangers. The exhibition continues until June 30.

New book recounts Bush's decision to topple Hussein

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Bob Woodward's bold, new book, Plan of Attack (Simon & Schuster), is an insider's view of how the United States planned last year's momentous invasion of Iraq.

Woodward, the celebrated Washington Post reporter and editor whose Capitol Hill contacts are unrivalled, was given unprecedented access to 75 of the key players.

He interviewed President George W. Bush, Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Secretary of State Colin Powell and officials in the White House and the Central Intelligence Agency.

Plan of Attack, which focuses on the 16 months preceding the second Gulf war, is thorough and fresh, brimming with heretofore unreported facts.

Bob Woodward

Woodward, however, focuses all his attention on the evolution of U.S. policy and rarely ventures outside the constricted confines of Washington, D.C.

He pays little or no attention to the manner in which the Bush administration cobbled together the "coalition of the willing" – the constellation of nations that supported and/or took part in the war. And he has virtually nothing to say about pivotal U.S. consultations with Israel, the Arab states, Turkey, the European Union, Russia or China.

This glaring failing notwithstanding, Plan of Attack is a crackerjack of a book, filled with revelations small and large.

Above all else, we learn that Bush first broached the idea of an invasion on Nov. 21, 2001, just 72 days after the Sept. 11 Arab terrorist attacks in the United States.

"What kind of a war plan do you have for Iraq?" Bush asked Rumsfeld. When he replied that the drafting of war plans was a complex and time-consuming process, Bush said, "Let's get started on this."

Rumsfeld did not have to be prodded. Within literally hours of Sept. 11, he had raised the possibility of attacking Iraq, being convinced that Saddam Hussein was somehow in cahoots with Al Qaeda's Osama bin Laden – a connection more imagined than real.

Bush's absorption with unseating the Taliban regime in Afghanistan, bin Laden's host and sponsor, precluded an immediate U.S. strike against Iraq. But after Nov. 21, 2001, the die was cast, though Iraq was not then considered a major strategic threat to American interests.

Bush's resolve to topple Hussein was hardly new, as it will be recalled that the Clinton administration introduced the concept of "regime change" in Baghdad.

It will come as no secret to knowlegeable readers that Paul Wolfowitz – the U.S. deputy secretary of defence – was the "intellectual godfather and fiercest advocate" of unseating Hussein.

Nor will they be surprised that Powell, a former general with somewhat dovish inclinations, harboured grave reservations about the strategy.

Having discovered that the existing plan to invade Iraq was cumbersome, Rumsfeld ordered Gen. Tommy Franks, the commander of U.S. forces in the Middle East, to draft a new one.

Within the Bush administration, the general assumption was that an invading U.S. force would be welcomed with open arms. "People will greet troops with flowers and sweets," Woodward quotes one unnamed effusive official as predicting.

In April 2002, Bush told a British television interviewer," I made up my mind that Hussein needs to go." But at a press conference in Europe a month later, he claimed disengenuously he had no war plans on his desk.

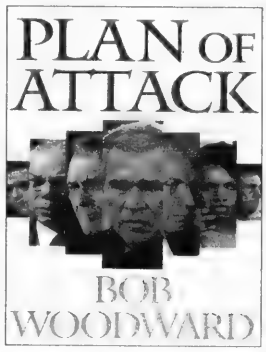
Powell, the commander of the coalition force that ejected Iraq from Kuwait in the 1991 Gulf War, was concerned that an invasion would destabilize pro-American Arab regimes, divert energy away from the war on terrorism and dramatically affect the supply and price of oil. He was also worried that the U.S. project to impose democracy on a country without democratic traditions would be problematic, to say the least.

Bush, having been influenced by his hawkish vice-president, Dick Cheney, disagreed with Powell's sombre assessment. "Saddam Hussein is a terrible guy who is teaming up with Al Qaeda. He tortures people and he hates Israel."

Moreover, Bush sincerely thought that regime change would help Israel resolve its historic conflict with the Palestinians.

Condoleezza Rice, the president's national security advisor, persuaded Bush that exhaustive United Nations inspections of Iraq's arsenal of weapons of mass destruction might avert war. She was convinced that his chemical and biological arms would be found.

It did not occur to her that a postwar search for such weapons would turn up zilch. Cheney brusquely dismissed weapons inspections as futile, not then knowing that Hussein's arsenal had already been destroyed by UN monitors.



In any case, Rumsfeld and Cheney were none too eager to take the issue to the UN, arguing that Hussein would exploit the opportunity for his own ends and embroil the United States in an endless round of useless talks.

Powell convinced Bush that the problem should be addressed by the UN through Resolution 1441, which warned Iraq of "serious consequences" should it continue to violate its disarmament obligations.

As the months passed, Bush concluded that arms inspections were not working and that Hussein, the ultimate prevaricator, was up to his old tricks.

In an interesting disclosure, Woodward writes that the Saudi ambassador in Washington, Prince Bandar, reminded Bush that Iraq was unfinished business – business his father had left uncompleted in 1991.

It was therefore incumbent on the United States to rid the region of Hussein, Prince Bandar said. But Saudi Arabia, being hostage to a rigidly anti-western and Islamic fundamentalist Wahhabi religious establishment, was prepared to help the United States only to a point.

On Jan. 13, 2003, Bush made the fateful decision to wage war.

"You understand the consequences?" Powell asked.

"Yeah, I do," Bush replied.

Eleven days later, Franks delivered his final war plan.

Elie Wiesel, the novelist, Nobel Peace Prize winner and Holocaust survivor, conferred with Rice at the White House on Feb. 27. When Bush dropped in, Wiesel told him that Iraq was a terrorist state and that American intervention was required.

The words were music to Bush's ears. "If we don't disarm Saddam Hussein, he will put a weapon of mass destruction on Israel," said Bush, who emerged from his chat with Wiesel in an exuberant mood. "This was a meaningful moment for me because it was a confirming moment," Bush told the author.

Three days before launching Operation Iraqi Freedom, Bush phoned Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

"Ariel, I told you in the Oval Office I would give you 72 hours' notice. I'm giving it to you now."

"We got it," Sharon said.

Woodward discloses that Rice gave her counterpart in Ottawa advance notice of the invasion. He assured Rice that Canada would keep its anti-war rhetoric to a minimum, satisfying Canadian public opinion without being belligerent or provocative.

On the night of March 19, Bush informed the world the invasion had begun.

U.S. Special Operations teams had already crossed the border from Jordan into western Iraq to try to find Scud missiles, which had wreaked havoc on Israel and Saudi Arabia 12 years earlier.

For better or worse, the United States had committed itself to toppling Hussein and exporting democracy to Iraq.

In Plan of Attack, the inestimable Woodward tells the story leading up to the invasion with verve and authority.

Winnipeg Negev Dinner to honour educator

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The focus of this year's Jewish National Fund Negev Gala – the local Jewish community's largest annual fundraiser – is on education.

The focus of the gala, to be held June 15, is reflected in the project being supported, the entertainer, and the honoree, Miriam Maltz.

"We are honouring Miriam Maltz out of respect for her 45 years of dedication to the students of Winnipeg in both the public school and Jewish school systems," says Len Podheiser, president of the JNF for Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

"In her teaching and her community work she has always been a strong supporter of the State of Israel."

Maltz said, "I see this honour not so much as a recognition of my work, as it is a recognition of the importance of educators and education.

"The JNF has always been very supportive of our educational institutions in this city."

Maltz retired last June as director of the Winnipeg Board of Jewish Education, capping a career that goes back almost 50 years.

She grew up in Fort William (now Thunder Bay), graduated from Queen's University in Kingston, and the Ontario College of Education in Toronto. She started her teaching career in northwestern Ontario, and shortly afterwards moved to Winnipeg because of the larger Jewish community here. For almost 30 years, she taught high school English and history in north Winnipeg high schools.

"For quite a while, I was the only Jewish high school teacher in the West Kildonan area," she says.

She also earned two degrees from the University of Manitoba – one of which came with a Gold Medal – and taught a course in the faculty of education called "The Methodology of Teaching High School English."

In the late 1950s and early 1960s, she served Manitoba's department of education in two capacities – revising the high school English curriculum followed by in-services for teachers, and setting and marking departmental exams.

Maltz's first brush with the Jewish school system came in 1963. While on a leave of absence from her board she filled in for three months at what was then a very small Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate. She was impressed with the quality of its students, she said.

In 1985, after an early retirement, she became principal of Ramah Hebrew School in south Winnipeg. "Although my first love was the classroom I had wonderful and rewarding years as an administrator. It turned out to be a plum job."

> 'We are honouring Miriam Maltz out of respect for her 45 years of dedication to the students of Winnipeg'

She retired a second time in 1997 just before the Jewish school system merged all its programs at the new Asper Jewish Community Campus.

Two years later, she came out of retirement to become the principal of Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate and then the interim director of education.

Through the Jewish school system, she notes, she has been able to develop a lengthy relationship with the JNF. "Our schools are very Israel-centred. At Ramah, we always sold more trees than at any other school in Canada. Also, our older students served as canvassers for the annual JNF community telethons."

To build on the theme of education, the entertainer at the gala is comedian Gabe Kaplan who is best known for his role as a dedicated teacher in the old hit series Welcome Back, Kotter. Proceeds for the evening, for the second year in a row, are being directed to the Asper Family Community Action Center in Ofaqim, Israel.

The Action Center provide supplementary educational programs geared towards disadvantaged youth, mainly children of Russian and Ethiopian olim, to help ensure they achieve their optimal level of education through combining technology-oriented education with instruction on leadership skills and heritage.

Flyers' Snider a benefactor of human rights museum

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

In the midst of the NHL's Stanley Cup playoffs, Ed Snider was unable to be in Israel alongside keynote speaker Arnold Schwarzenegger for the groundbreaking of a new museum designed to foster human understanding.

The chair of the Philadelphia Flyers was one of the principal benefactors of the new Center for Human Dignity-Museum of Tolerance Jerusalem, and one of the wings is named for him.

The unique project has received a very positive response, said Snider, an advisory board member of the Los Angeles-based Simon Wiesenthal Center, which is building the museum in downtown Jerusalem modeled on the one it developed in L.A.

The $200-million (US) structure, designed by world-renowned architect Frank Gehry, is to be completed by 2007. It will focus on issues of human dignity and responsibility and seek to promote unity and respect among Jews and between people of all faiths.

Elected to Hockey Hall of Fame in 1988

"I'm not a very real pious Jew, but I'm very proud of my Jewish heritage," said Snider in a phone interview from his office inside Philadelphia's Wachovia Center, where the night before, he and some friends watched on TV as the Flyers ended the Maple Leafs' season on Jeremy Roenick's game 6 overtime winner.

"I'm heavily involved in the community with Federation in Philadelphia and Santa Barbara, Ca., and buy ambulances pretty regularly for Israel, because I feel I just want to do whatever I can to help. I'm very concerned about Israel and the Jewish people as a whole with what's going on in the world today," he said.

Snider, who also gave a major gift last December to the National Museum of American Jewish History in Philadelphia, was the driving force behind bringing a hockey franchise to the city in 1966.

Since then, the Flyers have won two championships (1974, 1975) and appeared in seven Stanley Cup finals.

In 1974, Snider created Spectacor, a management company to oversee the Flyers and the Spectrum. It became a national force in sports and entertainment, founding or acquiring nearly a dozen businesses, including WIP, the country's first all-sports radio station.

In 1988, the year he was elected to the Hockey Hall of Fame, Snider decided that to remain competitive the team needed a new home. Eight years later, the Wachovia Center stood as a tribute to his perseverance.

The 71-year-old gave up majority ownership of the Flyers in 1996, entering into a merger with Comcast to create Comcast-Spectacor. Comcast acquired 66 per cent of the Flyers, the 76ers, the AHL's Philadelphia Phantoms and the First Union Complex.

Snider chairs the venture and owns 34 per cent of the package while overseeing operations of both the Flyers and 76ers.

A member of the NHL's executive committee, Snider was a co-recipient of the 1980 Lester Patrick Award for outstanding service to hockey in the United States (along with Flyers GM and President Bob Clarke) and in 1997 he was inducted into the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame in Philadelphia.

In the past, the Flyers organization was often portrayed as one that turned its back on Europeans, in particular players hailing from the former Soviet Union. They did so in large part because of the way Jews were treated in that part of the world, Snider said.

"I would not take players from behind the Iron Curtain unless they escaped," said Snider, who was very involved in causes to help free Soviet Jews.

"Some of the teams, prior to the fall of the Iron Curtain, bargained with the various federations and I felt that was like dealing in slavery. I just wouldn't do it.

"Once the Iron Curtain came down and the people were free, we never had any prohibition against any type of foreign players," he said.

Women's team seeks players

Women aged 40 and over are being invited to try out for a masters basketball team that will compete in the Maccabiah Games in Israel in July 2005. Participants should have played high school basketball or been members of an organized league. A team information night will take place at the end of May 2004. For more information, contact Barbara at goldyb52@hotmail.com.

Two for Bridge

By ERIC KOKISH and BEVERLEY KRAFT

Eric: Back in the days when all North American bridge players were created equal, it was not uncommon for Canadian experts to compete in the major championship events with American teammates. These were qualifying events for the North American Trials, conducted on a Pairs basis, the top three finishers forming the international team. This format produced some strange bedfellows but none stranger than Toronto's Eric Rutherford Murray and New York's Al Roth, who would emerge as team-mates from the US Trials to select the 1967 team for the Bermuda Bowl in Miami Beach.

During the Trials, Roth, known worldwide for his conservative initial actions, found himself in an elevator with Murray, known Canada-wide as a free spirit in this domain. Murray, a mischievous fellow by nature, decided to stir up the pot with the dogmatic Roth by initiating a discussion about this deal:

No one vulnerable, North deals:

North
♠ AQ93
♥ 10873
♦ AJ86
♣ 4

West
♠ KJ85
♥ J954
♦ 7
♣ QJ52

East
♠ 1072
♥ A62
♦ Q42
♣ K983

South
♠ 64
♥ KQ
♦ K10953
♣ A1076

West	North	East	South
	Murray		Kehela
	1♥	Pass	2♦
Pass	3♦	Pass	4♣
Pass	4♦	Pass	5♦
All Pass

Opening Lead: ♠5

"I guess you'd open a diamond with the North hand, playing five-card majors," he began. "You have nothing, you can't open," snapped Roth, as Murray knew he would. "Well, I opened 1♥," continued Murray, "we play four-card majors, you know. We missed our slam, though. We played in only 5♦, making six. I thought my partner played it pretty well." At the mention of the word "slam" Roth raised an eyebrow.

Murray's partner, Sami Kehela, finessed the ♠Q at trick one, crossed to the ♣A, ruffed a club, and played a heart. East ducked so the king won and another club was ruffed. East won the second heart and played a spade. Declarer won the ace, ruffed a spade, ruffed his last club, and played dummy's last spade. East discarded, so declarer ruffed low and played a trump to the ace. Dummy had two hearts remaining, East held the ♦Q4 and declarer the ♦K10. With the contract guaranteed and the lead in dummy, Kehela was in a position to over-ruff East for an overtrick.

Roth's reaction was entirely in character: "I don't know how anyone can play bridge with someone who bid that hand as badly as you."

"Well, perhaps," countered Murray, "but what was your result on that one?"

"We played in two diamonds, making six," muttered Roth, as he got off on the wrong floor.

Beverly: Well, standard bidding in North America has progressed since those golden days. Today most players, like the legendary Roth, would recognize the dangers inherent in the 4=4=4=1 distribution (what will North rebid over a 1♠ response, for example) but open 1♦ nonetheless. Some would rebid 1NT over 1♠, others 2♣, neither entirely satisfactory. We could live with a mildly conservative pass because it will often be easy to show this hand later if the opponents bid spades (we can double for takeout) and it might well be better to defend without revealing where the strength lies.

Try your hand at responding to partner's 1♦ opening with each of the following hands. Assume no one is vulnerable.

West	North	East	South
	1♦	Pass	?

(a) ♠9 ♥K74 ♦AQJ95 ♣A762
(b) ♠K6 ♥97 ♦AJ1062 ♣Q1093
(c) ♠94 ♥85 ♦AJ105 ♣KQJ106
(d) ♠AKJ105 ♠6 ♦KJ92 ♣A105

Solutions:
(a) Three spades. This "splinter" raise shows shortness in the jump-suit, controls in the unbid suits, strong support and strength appropriate to relinquish captaincy without discomfort. If partner tries 3NT, you'd be content to pass, having shown your hand.
(b) Three diamonds. This is a limit raise that invites game and denies a four-card major. Opener may pass, bid 3NT, show a major-suit stopper, or move towards 5♦ or a slam.
(c) Two clubs. Then, over 2♦, a non-forcing 3♦. If opener rebids 2NT, however, 3♦ would be forcing. Thus responder could stop short of game by passing, but would probably risk 3♦ to improve his chances of reaching the best strain.
(d) Two spades. Responder has obvious slam potential, yet can't take control. His best move is to start with a strong bid, show support, and leave the rest to opener, who will appreciate strong diamonds, aces, kings, and the ♠Q. A popular plan would be to bid hearts next, by agreement showing shortage with primary diamond support. Opener will devalue the ♥K but appreciate the ♣K on that sequence.

Transition time

As I write this column, there are three months left to my year in AVODAH: The Jewish Service Corps program. I have spent three-quarters of a year living with a group of other AVODAH participants in New York City, working full-time as a legal advocate for homeless and poor people and exploring social, economic and ethical issues that affect me as a Jew, a woman and a human being.

By ELISHEVA GOULD

Last month, four of my fellow AVODAHniks and I rented a car and drove to Washington, D.C., to participate in the March for Women's Lives in support of abortion and women's rights to control their bodies and keep their reproductive choices personal and private. I stood and rallied with what seemed to be at least one million people and listened to speakers Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton, actress Susan Sarandon and writer Gloria Steinem.

It was exhilarating to be a part of such a monumental event, to have made the trip from New York to Washington with my like-minded friends, and to be waving our program's banner proudly alongside the D.C. AVODAH group with whom we reunited that day. So far this year, I have learned and experienced things I never imagined I would and have gained political knowledge and a newfound sense of self-empowerment.

However, as the end of my year here approaches, my peers and I face many difficult decisions. Do we try to stay in New York City or return to our homes? Do we live on the Upper West Side or remain in Brooklyn? Do we stay at our current workplaces or search for new work? Do we go to the graduate schools we got accepted to, spend another year in the workforce or travel the world for awhile?

It is transition time in the AVODAH household and our stress levels are running high. Every day, we receive good news about someone winning a scholarship for medical school or being accepted into the foreign teaching exchange program of his or her choice. But every day we also discuss what we want to do with our lives: Should we stay or should we go? Should I begin to fundraise for my position so that I can continue to work at my small non-profit organization or should I apply for another job?

Many of us are currently applying for jobs in New York and our home cities and we'll make our "big move" decisions based on the offers we receive. As much as I miss my family and friends in Toronto, I would love to live in New York City for at least one more year before I go to graduate school. But one must have a job that pays the rent, grocery bills and other living expenses in this thrilling but very costly city. So wish me luck as I apply for jobs in my pursuit to live in New York City next year.

It is a nerve-racking time, filled with uncertainties. It is also an exciting time, full of questions as to which of us will remain here next year, who will be roommates with whom and where we will all end up living, studying, travelling and working. Today, we worked together all day in the garden behind our house, planting seeds that will grow within the next few summer months and sowing others that will not grow within our tenure in this house – only part of the legacy we hope to leave for next year's program participants.

CARAMEL APPLE CHEESECAKE FOR SHAVUOT

Crust
1/4 cup sugar
1 1/2 cups graham cracker crumbs
1/4 cup butter or margarine, melted

Filling
1 lb. caramels
1 can evaporated milk
1 cup pecans
1/2 cup sugar
2 eggs
16 oz. softened cream cheese
1 1/2 cups Golden delicious apples, chopped
1 tblsp. flour
1/2 tsp. cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350°F. Combine cracker crumbs, 1/4 cup sugar and butter; press onto sides and bottom of 9" springform pan. Melt caramels in heavy saucepan. Add evaporated milk over low heat, stirring until smooth. Reserve 1/2 cup melted caramel mixture. Pour remaining caramel mixture over crust and sprinkle with 1/2 cup chopped pecans. Beat cream cheese and 1/2 cup sugar until smooth. Add eggs, beating until smooth. Toss together 1 cup chopped apple, flour and cinnamon; fold into cheese mixture. Spoon mixture over crust. Bake 40 min. Combine reserved caramel and remaining chopped apples. Spread over cheesecake; sprinkle with remaining pecans. Continue baking 15 min. Cool. Chill before serving.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have been playing the singles game for a long time now and have finally met a kind, wonderful man. Josh is really in tune with my needs, and really listens to me when I speak. We have close to the same life values and just seem to be on the same page, and did I mention that he is not too hard to look at either!

I feel very petty even mentioning this problem, but here goes… He cries often. He cries watching sad or heartfelt movies or TV shows and when confronted with emotional situations.

What is that? Men in general don't cry, and for sure, not in public. I don't even know any women that cry as much as he does.

Do you think I can approach this subject with him or should I just pretend not to notice and stop being so petty?

Crying Game

Dear Crying Game,

Congratulations on finding the man of your dreams. From your description, Josh sounds like a very sensitive person who is attentive to you. It's phenomenal to be able to find a match that fits you this well.

The traits that you mention show just how responsive and perceptive he is towards you. What you are trying to do is draw a line in the sand that he should not step over. Yes, you want him to be sensitive, but to stop when the emotion shows outwardly in the form of tears.

Society has conditioned us to perceive a crying man as weak, and we all know that "big boys don't cry." Right? Wrong. Thank goodness for men like Josh. He has broken through the barriers that society has placed on gender and is not afraid to show real emotion.

In a nutshell, this is not Josh's problem, it is yours. You must step back and take a look at the big picture. Is Josh a wonderful, special partner or not? Instead of seeing his crying as a weakness, see it as a strength, the strength of a man not ashamed or embarrassed to show emotion. There is a lot we could all learn from Josh.

So long, Walking Man

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

In our bid to connect ourselves to "community," we establish landmarks or communal signposts of sorts in our head that are generally physical in nature and elicit an personal sense of belonging and connectivity.

Throughout the years, after a trip, I knew I had returned to the Toronto Jewish community when I saw familiar sights such as Richman's bakery or the Jewish Community Centre.

Similarly, there are certain personalities in our community who add a human brushstroke to our neighbourhood map – people who Eli Wiesel suggests are "the keepers of our truth."

They might be obstreperous servers at a Jewish eatery, but each one has a function in the individual script we create as community members.

The Toronto Jewish community lost such a person only a few weeks ago. His name was Naftoli (Neil) Mernick, and he was only 49 years old.

Naftoli was the fellow, you might remember, who walked briskly up and down Bathurst Street and surrounding roads with his kippah perched proudly on his head and his long beard – the one the Lubavitcher Rebbe told him never to touch – flowing adventurously with every step.

Some people called Naftoli "The Walking Man," reflective of a song written by James Taylor, a folksy rock balladeer. In the song, Taylor writes about a man who walked with a "silent desperation" heading toward a "hypothetical destination." It often seemed as if Naftoli's quick pace was like that – hurried, taking him nowhere specific, as if to rediscover something very dear that he had lost.

But his family and friends who knew Naftoli when his gait was calmer and his gaze was in the present recall a bright, savvy man, a gifted musician with an acute empathy and love for the Jewish people.

They remember Naftoli during the Yom Kipper War in 1973 when he played for Israeli soldiers, one day giving eight consecutive concerts. They remember when he received his rabbinical ordination from Or Samayach in Jerusalem. Just like James Taylor's walking man, Neil always seemed to "keep an eye on the holy land."

Naftoli's internal peace began to crumble after his father's death, and he took to walking. I wonder what he saw when he watched us, or the knowledge he had about the Toronto Jewish community as one of its keepers of truth.

Surely there were those who considered stopping Neil on his journey, to reminisce about their days together in Eitz Chaim School and/or Ner Israel Yeshiva. But it's hard to engage a walking man. He often prefers not to slow down, or we ourselves become hesitant facing his distinctive gaze. Sometimes I felt that way.

However, it is clear that Naftoli Mernick will always be remembered as a genuine Jewish soul – one described by a friend as "unable to merge with others like most of us, but [who] instead exuded authenticity."

His legacy will live in the minds of thousands of Israeli soldiers who had a moment of solace listening to Naftoli's sweet voice and buoyant lyrics; in the hearts of his brothers Farley, Shlome and Earl, who harbour reminiscences of a virtuous sibling; in each guitar strum played by his students; and in the effervescence of Jewish youth as they sing the words of Shifti, a popular song to this day, produced by Naftoli and brother Shlome.

Goodbye Naftoli – our guileless Walking Man. We will miss the brushstroke you brought to our neighbourhood map and pray you are sitting well rested at the feet of God.

For information on Naftoli's shloshim, call David Plonka at 416 630 1679.

"Well now, would he have wings to fly Golden wings against the sky. Walking man walk on by. So long, walking man, so long."
– James Taylor

Ceremony of remembrance

The memory of the thousands of Ethiopian Jews who died in the African desert while trying to reach Israel was honoured for the first time at an official ceremony in Jerusalem last week. President Moshe Katsav, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and leaders of the Ethiopian Jewish community paid tribute to the fallen at a memorial in Jerusalem's Ramat Rachel neighbourhood. In the 1980s, more than 4,000 Jews lost their lives to hunger, disease and bandits, and there are few Ethiopian families in Israel today who have not suffered a loss. [Isranet photo]

Egyptian school texts defame Israel and Jews

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Twenty-five years after Egypt entered into a peace treaty with Israel, a survey of textbooks in Egyptian schools paints a disturbing picture.

The books generally portray Israel and Jews in a negative light.

The Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace, in conjunction with the American Jewish Committee, recently released a report to coincide with the 25th anniversary of the treaty, signed in Washington, D.C. in March 1979.

Compiled, translated and edited by Arnon Groiss, it is entitled Jews, Christians, War and Peace in Egyptian School Textbooks.

Based in Jerusalem and established in 1998, The Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace aims to foster a climate of tolerance and mutual respect between peoples and nations.

New leaders present their case

— Comment —

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

With a federal election on its way, Canadians face a fresh slate of three new federal leaders – and something of a question mark.

Stephen Harper

Jack Layton

Paul Martin

For Jewish Canadians, at least, little is known about where Paul Martin, Stephen Harper and Jack Layton, the leaders of the three national, non-regional federal parties, stand on issues of concern to the community, especially Israel and the peace process.

While Layton was the only federal leader to attend the March rally in Toronto against anti-Semitism, it's a safe bet his New Democrats won't be getting too many Jewish votes given the worldwide near-abandonment of Israel by the left, if not its outright hostility to the Jewish state and the Zionist dream.

But there's an added twist: Many of Canada's 580,000 Muslims have found a home in the NDP, and the party's fortunes could be boosted as a result.

Members of Harper's Conservative party, especially MPs such as Jason Kenney and former Alliance leader Stockwell Day,

Sheikh can't visit

OTTAWA — The Canadian government will not grant a visa to the imam of the grand mosque of Mecca, who has called Jews "rats" and "scum" and called for their destruction. The government earlier had rejected a parliamentary motion by Conservative MP Jason Kenney to bar Sheik Abd al-Rahman Al-Sudais from Canada. But a government spokesperson later said Al-Sudais is on a government watch list and would be prevented from entering the country.

Prize Winner

TORONTO — Abe Levine has won the grand prize for the 2003 Israel Pledge Campaign, co-sponsored by the Israel Ministry of Tourism and the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations. The Israel Pledge campaign is a program implemented by the Israel Ministry of Tourism to promote continued travel to Israel.

Site Shut Down

EDMONTON — Police have shut down a white supremacist website and seized Nazi paraphernalia after raiding an Edmonton home. The police action against the Western Canada for Us site came following a complaint from an anti-racism group.

World

Leaders Meet Annan

NEW YORK — Representatives of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations met last week with UN Secretary General Kofi Annan to voice their concerns about the double standard applied to Israel at the United Nations, and the rise of Islamic and European anti-Semitism. According to the Conference of Presidents, Annan distanced himself from comments made by his special adviser for Iraq, Lakhdar Brahimi, who said Israel's policies were "poison" to the region. Annan also said Brahimi denied saying he had never shaken the hand of an Israeli or a Jew.

Tony Randall Dies

NEW YORK — Tony Randall, the fastidious half of "the Odd Couple," died last week at age 84. Randall was born Leonard Rosenberg and was raised in Tulsa, Okla. An award-winning actor, he is best known as the neat-freak Felix in the 1970s TV version of the Neil Simon play, opposite Jack Klugman. While in his mid-70s, Randall fathered two children for the first time.

Celebrating Israel

MOSCOW — An estimated 7,000 Moscow Jews attended a street festival outside the Choral Synagogue to celebrate Israel's 56th anniversary. The seven-hour event, sponsored by the Jewish Agency, the Jewish Community of Moscow and the Russian Jewish Congress, included music and dance performances as well as a video link with Jerusalem.

Gere to Israel

NEW YORK — Actor Richard Gere will be a guest of honour at Tel Aviv University's student film festival. The visit to the festival, which begins June 5, will be Gere's third trip to Israel in the past three years. The previous two were to promote Israeli-Palestinian dialogue.

Plot Down Under

SYDNEY — A convert to Islam is trial for planning to blow up the Israeli Embassy in Australia. Prosecutors in Perth allege Jack Roche, 50, met with Osama bin Laden in Afghanistan in March 2000 and was told to form an Al-Qaeda cell in Australia. After receiving explosives training in Afghanistan, Roche planned to use a truck bomb to blow up the embassy in Canberra, the charges say.

JVS Receives Funding

TORONTO — Joe Volpe, Minister of Human Resources and Skills Development, last week announced Government of Canada funding of $1,231,844 for three projects of the Jewish Vocational Service of Metropolitan Toronto (JVS) and COSTI, an organization that supports new immigrants. These three HRDC projects will provide employment services for 1,430 individuals.

Under Project Job Search, JVS Toronto will receive $300,223 to help 350 individuals who face barriers to employment. Participants will include individuals with communication and language issues, learning disabilities, addictions, depression or other psychological difficulties, and sporadic and long-term unemployment.

Under the second project, Employment Assistance Services, JVS Toronto will receive $443,621 to help 300 unemployed foreign-trained professionals and tradespeople to gain employment within their fields. Participants will receive work search strategy training and pre-employment workshops.

Aliyah: 'Start process when emotionally ready'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Special Report

It all starts with a visit to Gadi Anavi's cluttered office in a gleaming building at the corner of Dufferin and Finch in north Toronto.

Anavi, the director of the Israel Aliyah Center, facilitates the immigration of Torontonians to the Jewish state.

After three years on the job, he has some definite advice for prospective olim.

"You should start the process when you're emotionally ready," said Anavi, who plans to return to Israel in August. "Some people prepare a few years in advance. Others begin several months before. I recommend a lead time of at least six months."

Three of the prospective immigrants he is sending to Israel are Amalia Wolf – a single woman soon to be wed – and Alex and Tanya Pomson, a married couple with four school-aged children.

Wolf and the Pomsons plan to leave Canada in the summer.

They are among a small band of Canadian Jews, most of whom are observant, who have decided to immigrate to Israel – the tense, uncertain security situation and the prospect of a lower standard of living notwithstanding.

Since 1948, a grand total of 11,920 Canadians have immigrated to Israel, according to Israel's Central Bureau of Statistics.

In 1971, the peak year, 758 Canadians made aliyah. In 1956, the low point, Israel attracted only 22 Canadian immigrants. On average, 216 Canadian olim immigrate to Israel per annum.

Last year, Anavi – a 49-year-old sabra from Haifa and a seasoned employee of the Jewish Agency who works in tandem with a fellow shaliach in Montreal – processed 134 olim (six of whom were from Vancouver). In 2002 and 2001, he settled 106 and 82 Canadians in Israel.

This year's figures should be better. "We're expecting a 30 percent increase," said Anavi.

Although global aliyah declined by approximately one-third last year, with some 25,000 immigrants from around the world having gone to Israel, North American immigration has picked up lately.

Alex Pomson and his family, on holiday in Cape Breton, are moving to Israel this summer.

Since the late 1980s, upwards of one million immigrants, the bulk from the former Soviet Union, have made aliyah.

During the same period, 270,000 Israelis reportedly left the country. Recently, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon talked of attracting one million immigrants over the next number of years.

Anavi is also upbeat. "The numbers are increasing and more and more people are applying for aliyah. We're optimistic about the future."

The second Palestinian uprising – which has claimed the lives of almost 1,000 Israelis since September 2000 – and the resulting economic downturn have generally dampened aliyah.

But aliyah is bouncing back, buoyed by the first glimmerings of an Israeli economic recovery and the sinking realization that the intifadah may last for years. "Sad to say, people have got used to the war," said Anavi in a reference to the Palestinian rebellion.

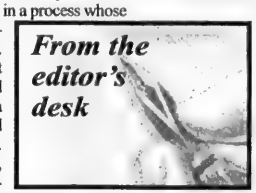
Living in a surreal world



Though the responsibility is great and the importance of the work undisputed, one of the most difficult and probably unpleasant jobs on earth is that of Israel's ambassador to the United Nations.

Imagine, if you can, what it must be like to sit, mostly friendless, at a table with 15 others, or occasionally at a table with 190 others, always singled out, always under attack, always maligned, always vilified and having to take part in a process whose outcome is always predetermined and hostile.

The job requires great strength of character and the ability to live in a Salvador Dalian world of the bizarre and surreal.

Dan Gillerman, Israel's current ambassador, has that strength. His protective suit of armour is the sense of purpose and historic mission he feels about his work – being the UN spokesperson for the Jewish state.

Last Wednesday, he once again donned his armour to do futile battle with Israel's accusers.

Merely hours after the first news of Palestinian civilian deaths in Rafah, and without full knowledge of the facts surrounding the deaths, the United Nations Security Council condemned Israel by a vote of 14-0. The United States abstained.

The deaths of the civilians were indeed deplorable. But Israel was convicted for them and sentenced before all the facts were brought to light.

In contrast, one week earlier, a pregnant Israeli and her four daughters were shot to death at point-blank range by cowardly, murderous Palestinian terrorists. No one was put into the defendants' dock.

Nor have they ever been. The lights at the Security Council were not even turned on. The chamber, much like the hearts and consciences of the majority members, remained dark.

Last week's Security Council resolution condemned "all acts of violence, terror and destruction," but failed to point out the reason for Israel's incursion into Rafah in the first place: to locate and destroy arms-smuggling tunnels that wind through civilian homes and are used by terrorists to bring in rocket-propelled grenades and missiles to Israel.

Israel's Minister of Justice, Yosef Lapid, pointed out that terrorists in Rafah are trying to smuggle Strela anti-aircraft missiles into their precincts to be used against civilian airliners.

"If this happens, God forbid, and airplanes are shot down, people will ask us why we didn't act to stop it," Lapid said.

According to the Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon, large caches of Katyusha rockets are hidden along the Egyptian side of the border awaiting distribution through the Rafah tunnels.

The resolution also made reference to Israel's "obligation not to undertake demolition of homes contrary to [international humanitarian] law" and relied upon outrageously falsified data to justify acceptance of the vote.

But the houses bulldozed or otherwise destroyed by Israel were military installations. They had long ago been appropriated by terrorists and gunmen. For the most part, they were unoccupied and used for sniper attacks against Israelis or they concealed tunnels for arms smuggling. These houses, therefore, were legitimate military targets.

Gillerman eloquently stated Israel's case.

"We convene here as usual," he began, "at the urgent behest of the Palestinian observer, under a barrage of information, misinformation and disinformation. In the interests of truth and objectivity, let us first get the facts straight. I wish to state emphatically that the numbers distributed by the Palestinians are exaggerated and totally false. I can only express my disappointment that some members of the international community, including in the statement attributed to the Secretary-General, have been misled by the Palestinian propaganda machine to false conclusions which do not reflect the facts on the ground…"

Gillerman was quite blunt and straightforward about Israel's predicament. "Today Israel stands at the gates of hell in the Gaza Strip."

But he explicitly outlined Israel's hope for the future. "We have no war with the Palestinian aspiration for statehood. The prime minister has stated clearly that Israel believes in the vision of two states, side by side, in peace and security. We have a war with terror, and with those who are determined not to create the Palestinian state, but to destroy the Jewish one…

"A genuine and responsible Palestinian leadership must be called finally and in clear terms – not in the faltering language of this typically one-sided resolution – to fight a war with terror too. It is time that we should ask the Palestinian leadership whether inciting terror, smuggling weapons and celebrating by dancing with the limbs of the dead are helping the cause of their people. It is time to make it clear that terrorism, even in the Palestinian cities of Gaza, is always unacceptable," said Gillerman.

Israeli, Palestinian unite in calling for peace

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

An Israeli ex-admiral and a Palestinian educator told a synagogue audience last week how Israelis and Palestinians can break the cycle of violence and move toward coexistence within the framework of a permanent peace agreement.

Speaking at Holy Blossom Temple on a day when fighting raged in the Gaza Strip, Ami Ayalon and Sari Nusseibeh, the co-founders of The People's Voice initiative, fleshed out their six-point plan for creating public support and momentum for a two-state solution based, more or less, on the pre-1967 lines.

In separate presentations, they agreed that peace is possible only if both sides forego their historic dreams and clearly define the objectives of a comprehensive accord at the start of negotiations.

The pair concurred that the step-by-step interim approach of the now-defunct Oslo peace process had been a failure largely because the thorniest issues, from final borders to Palestinian refugees, had been deferred.

Officially launched last June after a year of preparation, The People's Voice has collected 180,000 Israeli signatures and 140,000 Palestinian signatures supporting its aims.

The Ayalon/Nusseibeh proposal calls for an end-of-conflict agreement and "two states for two peoples," with borders roughly based on the June 4, 1967, lines and the possibility of mutually agreed territorial exchanges.

Jerusalem will be the capital of both states, with Israeli neighbourhoods under Israel's control and Arab districts under Palestinian administration. The holy places will be under neither Israeli nor Palestinian sovereignty, and Palestinian refugees will return to a demilitarized Palestinian state.

Ayalon, the former commander of the Israeli navy and the one-time director of Israel's domestic intelligence agency, the Shin Bet, said Israelis must give up their messianic claim to the West Bank and the Gaza Strip so that Israel can flourish as a democratic Jewish state within secure boundaries.

Claiming his vision is shared by some two-thirds of Israelis, he declared, "We want to see Israel as a democracy and a safe home for the Jewish people. If this is what we want, there must be a Palestinian state. Otherwise, we can't be what we want to be."

Ayalon said Israelis and Palestinians are awakening from their respective dreams of preserving a greater Israel and forming a Palestinian state stretching from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean Sea.

Nusseibeh, the president of Al Quds University in eastern Jerusalem and the Palestinian Authority's former representative there, implored his fellow Palestinians to be practical.

He urged them to abandon their dream of returning to their homes in what is now Israel and to focus all their energies on achieving statehood in the West Bank and Gaza.

The "right of return," he suggested, is a just cause in theory, but unfulfillable in practice.

He warned his people that if they cling to the right of return, which he described as "a kind of yearning to return in space and time," they will achieve neither independence nor freedom.

It is better to establish a state, even on a small part of historic Palestine, than to leave refugees in squalid refugee camps without dignity or a future.

Acknowledging that Palestinians will have to pay a hefty price for statehood, Nusseibeh said, "We recognize that the refugees will be absorbed in a Palestinian state and not in Israel."

Saying the past cannot be resurrected, he called on Palestinians to face their responsibility to the future.

In a tough appraisal of the Oslo process, Nusseibeh said it was undermined by two fundamental misconceptions. Instead of addressing key permanent-status issues at the beginning of talks, negotiators left them for last and focused on signing interim accords.

"This method turned out to be a mistake," he observed, saying it had destroyed mutual trust and confidence.

Olso, though reflecting far-sightedness and ingenuity, was a "top-down" process conceived and implemented by an elite of leaders. Ordinary people were left out of the loop and "kept in the dark." As a result, Nusseibeh claimed, they felt disengaged from the process and fell back into familiar modes of mutual hatred and recrimination.

"Our initiative addresses these faults," he explained. Difficult issues are addressed head-on and transparency is the name of the game.

Calling the present Israeli-Palestinian impasse "tragic and painful," Nusseibeh asserted that both sides must be clear and upfront about their intentions.

"I can't negotiate with Israelis unless I know it will lead to my independence and freedom. I don't want to be conned. We can work together if I know, at the end of the day, I can set up my independent state."

Offering a similar analysis, Ayalon speculated that a lack of clarity had killed Oslo. "The founders were, in a way, afraid to touch the final issues… and their constructive ambiguity was destructive. Our initiative is as clear as possible and hides nothing."

Ayalon said that increasing numbers of Israelis understand that military force will not bring them security. "We will have security only when the Palestinians have hope and feel secure."

In his view, Palestinians will not fight homegrown terrorism unless they know in advance that negotiations will yield an independent Palestinian state. Palestinians have no such hope today, and that is the "real reason for the violence around us."

Elias Hazineh, the president of Palestine House, a Toronto cultural and advocacy organization, kicked off the evening by saying he did not necessarily agree with the goals of The People's Voice.

"We have great reservations about giving up the right of return," he said, adding that "dialogue is better than shooting."

Ruling on wigs from India causes uproar

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Orthodox women around the world are reacting with consternation at a recent ruling that they should not wear human hair wigs because they may have been used in idolatrous ceremonies in India.

The situation is compounded by the fact that the ruling is not final, with many rabbis telling their congregants to put the human hair wigs aside until a final ruling is made and others instructing that they be burned immediately, and also by a growing sense of panic caused by rumour, innuendo and hysteria since the news broke two weeks ago.

A committee of scholars is currently investigating in India and a final decision on the matter is expected shortly from Rabbi Yosef Shalom Elyashiv, the halachic expert who made the recent ruling in Israel.

According to Rabbi Elyashiv, much of the human hair used to make wigs comes from Venkateswara Temple in Tirupati, where Hindu women cut off their hair as a sacrifice to their gods and goddesses.

In Jewish theological thought, this is considered avodah zarah or idol worship, and Jews are forbidden to get any benefit of any kind from it. Something used for avodah zarah cannot be simply thrown out or even given to someone else, such as a non-Jewish cancer patient who has lost her hair as a result of chemotherapy. It must be burned.

Recent articles in the New York Times and Ha'aretz newspapers have reported bonfires in Brooklyn; in Kiryas Joel, a Satmar village in Orange County, N.Y.; and in Israel. So heated did things become in Brooklyn that one woman there was arrested for disorderly conduct.

There have also been reports of bonfires in the Bathurst and Wilson neighbourhood of Toronto.

When the news broke, many women panicked. Human hair wigs, even blends of human and synthetic hair, are expensive, with some costing thousands of dollars. There was further upset when it was found that so-called cyberhair, one of the latest innovations thought by most to be synthetic, incorporated actual human hair, usually from India.

Hair from Europe or Korea is generally considered acceptable, although it's frequently more expensive.

Barbara Benmordecai sells, styles and cares for wigs at her Thornhill salon, Barbara's Wig and Hair. She said she has received "hundreds" of phone calls from women, many hysterical and crying.

"It was devastating. Some had four non-kosher wigs, which couldn't be used anymore."

Like all "sheitl machers," as they are called in the community, Benmordechai has a list of wigs from companies that are acceptable – that is, those that do not use Indian hair – and others that are not.

Cyberhair, she said, is one of the most popular kind of sheitl for young women, because "it looks good, feels good and is a good price."

Benmordecai is now stocking as many entirely synthetic wigs as she can. Many are made of kanekalon, a man-made fibre that is "soft, light, easy to care for and pretty much wash and wear."

Rabbi Benjamin Hecht, executive director of Nishma, an educational organization in Toronto, said the injunction for married women to cover their hair comes from a passage in the Torah describing the procedure when a woman was suspected of committing adultery. The kohen, the priest, uncovers her hair, indicating, the sages say, that modest women covered their hair at that time, and should also do so now.

While some feel the hair should be covered with a hat, a scarf or a covering called a snood, Rabbi Hecht said the use of wigs is generally accepted by large numbers in the Orthodox community. This is especially true for women employed in the secular world.

In addition, wigs are simply more attractive. While some sages have said the purpose of covering hair is to make a woman less attractive to men other than their husbands, most say that one's own hair is the most beautiful thing, and must be reserved for one's spouse. According to this view, then, there is nothing wrong with looking as good as you can.

Rabbi Gedalia Schwartz, head of the rabbinical court of Chicago and the Rabbinical Council of America, has issued a statement saying, "There is not enough direct and factual information available to us at this time to issue a general ban on using such wigs." Accordingly, while "human hair wigs known to come from India should not be used until the matter is clarified further, … such wigs should not be destroyed."

Most Toronto rabbis are telling their congregants the same. Rabbi David Schochet, president of the Vaad Harabonim of Greater Toronto, said that while he has made individual rulings on the subject and spoke about it at his shul, the Chabad Lubavitch Community Centre, he preferred not to issue a statement at this time.

Before performing certain religious rites, Hindu women cut off their hair in the temple. The hair is put on the altar during the rite, and afterward, the priest removes the hair (some of which has been burnt) and sells it for use in the wig- making industry.

The point, Rabbi Hecht explained, is to see "what was in the mind of the people who gave their hair. Was it genuine idol- worshipping or not?"

Classical Jewish thought, he said, prohibits the use of anything used "in the service of Baal." As a result, he said, the nature of Hindu theology must be examined: is there a concept of a single God, with the gods and goddesses subservient to him and representing different concepts of God, or is there more than one god?

He said the question is also whether the cutting of the hair is the act of worship or merely preparation for worship.

The situation is extremely serious to most Jews, particularly observant Jews. Jewish writings, including such basic works as the Shulchan Aruch, have an absolute horror of the very idea of avodah zarah. The idea that one might come into contact, however unknowingly, with something used in avodah zarah is abhorrent.

This is not the first time the issue has come up. Rabbi Yisroel Belsky, an authority on Jewish law for the Orthodox Union in the United States, is quoted in the New York Times as saying a similar incident about 30 years ago "was resolved without a ban."

However, he said, "it appears that practices in the Hindu temples where the hair of Indian women is cut might have changed, prompting [Rabbi Elyashiv's recent] ruling."

Great Achievement Deserves Great Recognition

Our class of 2004 represents our most precious human investment. Men and women of extraordinary achievement and ambition, our 2,000 graduates gladly aspire to shape the future of the Jewish people and civilization.

Their quest for purpose and discovery enriches Jewish life and society at large whether...

- Identifying a gene involved in aging at Albert Einstein College of Medicine, or developing therapies to combat drug-resistant tuberculosis.
- Learning the law at Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, one of America's youngest, fastest-growing schools—with major programmes in intellectual property, dispute resolution, and Holocaust legal issues.
- Training doctoral students in clinical work with the elderly, making Ferkauf Graduate School of Psychology the only federally funded metro-New York site in the field.
- Educating top professionals at Wurzweiler School of Social Work to protect abused and at-risk children.
- Pursuing advanced Torah studies at the Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary with passion, while the Azrieli School's growing graduate programmes produce tomorrow's finest Jewish educators and leaders.
- YU student activists bring kollelim to communities worldwide, staff community-service programmes, and advocate for Israel, here and at The Hague; over 2,000 alumni and 700 students live and work in Israel.
- Undergraduates at Yeshiva College, Stern College, and Sy Syms School of Business pursue law, medicine, business, and humanities at the finest graduate schools —and include winners of Goldwater, Howard Hughes, Jack Kent Cooke, National Science, and Rhodes scholarships, among many prestigious awards.
- Investigating the meaning of the Dead Sea Scrolls, and the significance of Maimonides, 800 years later, in an international symposium at Revel Graduate School of Jewish Studies.

Dry Bones

In defence of Israel

There is never a justification for the killing of innocents. There are, however, explanations. Innocent Palestinians died last week in Rafah, and for that the government and the army of Israel apologized and conveyed their deep apologies. "I would like to express sorrow over the harming of Palestinian civilians," Minister of Defence Shaul Mofaz told the world shortly after the news of the deaths became known.

But as of this writing, the circumstances of the deaths are still unclear and are being investigated. What is known for certain is that the Palestinian Authority (PA) organized a march of hundreds of Palestinians on the main road of Rafah toward a position of Israeli soldiers in Tel Sultan. Armed gunmen were among the marchers, and shot at the Israeli positions from the crowd. The gunmen, as is their code of conduct, were using civilians as their shields. Moreover, various places along the road had been booby-trapped by the gunmen.

Four IDF tank shells and a helicopter missile were fired at an empty building and at a vacant area ahead of the surging Palestinians to deter their progress forward. The soldiers did not shoot at or into the oncoming crowd.

Explosions ensued within and near the mass of marchers. Seven people were killed, five of whom were carrying weapons. Two unarmed civilians were killed, a number more wounded. But the innocent victims were not targeted by Israeli soldiers. "No soldier or commander gave or received orders to fire directly at civilians," Israel's Chief of General Staff, Lt.-Gen. Moshe Ya'alon said.

It is possible that the casualties may have been caused when one or more of the exploding tank shells, fired as a warning to the marchers at the abandoned building, may have detonated an explosive set along the route by the Palestinian fighters.

The true facts will emerge in due course.

As if it were a rewinding of the tape of the Jenin "massacre" of March 2002, the rush to judgment and condemnation of Israel was predictable. From every corridor in the United Nations and foreign affairs ministry in Europe, the excoriation of the Jewish state followed its familiar pattern of aping the strident, unchallenged dissembling and wild incitement of the Palestinian Authority spokespersons. Yasser Arafat described the incident as a "brutal massacre of civilians." Saeb Erekat described the incident as a war crime.

Israel's purpose in Rafah is legitimate and justified. It is striking at the warehousing of terror there. Since 2002, some 85 tunnels used by Iran, Hezbollah, Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine for the smuggling of weapons have been discovered in Rafah. And the cargo travelling within those tunnels is no longer small arms ammunition but missiles and rockets to be used against the Israeli heartland.

There is no justification, ever, for the killing of innocent civilians. But sometimes there are explanations. And the explanation in the case of Rafah exculpates Israel of any deliberate act of wrongdoing among the reasonable and the fair-minded.

Kudos to Baycrest

I feel the need to express my sincere gratitude for the exceptional care and attention that patients receive at the rehabilitation program at the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

I was most impressed with the expertise of the professionals and the serious attitude and total dedication of all the staff.

The rehab centre is also equipped with all the necessary devices to facilitate appropriate exercises and physical care.

All in all, the patients here are assured that they are in the very best of hands.

Anti-Semites right or wrong

Anti-Semites have accused the Jews of wanting to take over or control the world.

Let's examine the facts:

From a sect within Judaism 2,000 years ago, from no more than a few hundred believers and followers at the time of Jesus' death, believers in the Jewish born Jesus have grown to almost two billion people world- wide out of a world population of 5½ to six billion.

On the other side, the descendants of the Judeans have barely survived the last 2,000 years, so that today they number about 13 or 14 million people. We are not a sect of any other religion, but a sect nevertheless, surviving within the cultures of other peoples and other countries.

So who is taking over the world? The followers of Jesus or the descendants of Abraham and Moses?

Zerbisias and the facts

After reading the May 20 column "According to Reports" ("Note to Zerbisias: facts matter," CJN, May 20), I wish to relate an anecdote concerning the Toronto Star's Antonia Zerbisias.

In January 2003, while he was in Israel, the CBC's Neil Macdonald attempted to organize a boycott of Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's annual cocktail reception for the foreign press working in Israel (about 300 strong). Macdonald wrote to them, suggesting they "find other work to do that day." The attempt was a colossal flop. All 300 journalists (with the possible exception of Macdonald) turned out for the reception. But Zerbisias wrote a piece on the Macdonald fiasco, suggesting it was not true.

She never did come right out and say that, she only implied it. I read the article three times to be sure. I e-mailed her and asked: "Since you know Neil Macdonald so well [she had said that he is a friend], tell me – did he or did he not try to organize a boycott of Ariel Sharon's annual cocktail party for the foreign press?"

Her response was a moan and groan about what a minefield it is to report on the Middle East. I asked the question again. It took three exchanges of e-mails, with Zerbisias dodging and ducking the question, before she finally admitted that the story was true.

Zundel is so predictable

As I read your article about Zundel requesting that Jewish leaders testify at his hearing ("Zundel calls Jewish leaders to testify at deportation hearing," CJN, May 13), I was taken back to the Keegstra trial in Calgary years ago. High school teacher Jim Keegstra taught his students that the Holocaust was a lie invented by the Jews.

Before the trial began, my Jewish friends (I am a gentile) and I were already sitting together along a single row of seats in what at that time of the day was an almost empty courtroom. When Keegstra's cronies came in and saw us sitting there, and knowing full well by the yarmulkas that my friends were Jewish, they chose to walk between our row of seats and the one ahead of us, even though the rest of the courtroom was virtually empty. They did this – and it seemed so blatant to me at the time – for the sole purpose of discomforting and harrassing them.

Now Zundel, who is of similar ilk to Keegstra, is also attempting to harrass Jews with his ridiculous request that Keith Landy and Frank Dimant testify at his deportation hearing. Everyone who knows how Zundel operates can already see that if the subpoenas are quashed and consequently Landy and Dimant do not have to testify at his deportation hearing, Zundel will accuse them of a cover-up. He is so predictable.

Is greeting a secret code?

The festival of Shavuot is one of several Jewish commemorative days in the year when friends and family shake my hand and implore me to "Hug Sam Ayech."

Who is Sammy Ayech and why must I hug him? And if I were able find Sam, what would happen after I'd hugged him? Or is there something more sinister afoot?

Could it be that the imperative is actually a password or code used by a secret worldwide Jewish organizaion and I've been idenitified mistakenly as a member?

The grandeur of Judaism versus the provinciality of Jewish education

The holiday of Shavuot, when we celebrate receiving the Torah, is an appropriate occasion to reflect on the nature of Jewish education. The CJN invited Daniel Marom, a dynamic and engaging Jewish educator, to do just that. This is the first of Marom's two-part essay.

By DANIEL MAROM

I remember Judaism coming alive for me during my teenage years in Toronto. It was not on Yom Kippur in the ostentatious stained glass-windowed synagogue we attended, when the honour of opening the ark was given to some of the well-to-do members, congregants rose at the command of the rabbi and the chazzan delivered his sanctimonious rendition of the central Mussaf Kedushah prayer. Nor was it when nostalgic family stories and heirlooms going back to eastern Europe were shared with me.

Judaism emerged for me once I actually understood the words in the biblical, rabbinic and prayer book texts and realized their implications for the choices I made.

After I learned the verse, "Thou shalt not put a stumbling block before the blind," you may have seen me on the streets of Toronto carefully removing any object I found in the middle of the sidewalk. These words seemed to come from a world beyond the Jewish environment in which I grew up, one that my sensibilities identified as being much more profound than what was transmitted to me by my day school teachers and shul functionaries.

The more I took in the transcendental truths and ultimate concerns posited by prophets, rabbis and other spiritual heroes in our tradition, the more I became critical of everyday life in Jewish Toronto, feeling that it was missing the crux of the Jewish matter. The rhetoric and patina were there, but the substance was not. Bathurst Street did not lead me closer to the Temple.

Today I am grateful for those years. However critical I was of my Jewish educators, I somehow was able to encounter the richness of Judaism, and this encounter launched me on an infinite quest through the majesty and mystery of Jewish civilization. Paradoxically, my critique of Jewish Toronto had a galvanizing effect on my Jewish identity. I attribute my decision to live in Israel and make my career in Jewish education to what I discovered back then.

Now, as I work as a Jewish educator, I am concerned that my experience was idiosyncratic. I do not assume because I was fortunate enough to connect with things Jewish that others who are educated in the same kind of problematic educational environment will necessarily connect as well. Indeed, difficult questions arise constantly when I see what transpires in kindergartens, classrooms, sanctuaries, camps, community centres, adult education programs, travel experiences, publications and public events.

Are Jewish communities successful in transmitting the rich content and profound relevance of being Jewish? Is there a gap between the meaning of the words on the page and what is internalized by Jewish learners? Do Jewish learners take the teachings of Judaism with them as they decide how to treat their bodies, their souls, their siblings and spouses, their fellow Jews, other human beings? Does Judaism affect what careers they choose, how they run their businesses, what they do with their leisure time?

There are too few educational frameworks in the Jewish community where such questions are discussed, let alone addressed. In institutions such as schools, synagogues and camps, everyday demands are so pressing they smother opportunities for deeper inquiry about the purpose and meaning of Jewish education.

Students take in a lesson on a synagogue bimah.

Instead, the most urgent questions are operational. How can resources be found to keep programs alive and running smoothly? What can be done in light of the lack of qualified personnel and creative curricula? How can our programs compete with (or co-opt?) the stimuli of North American leisure culture and still accommodate the dictates of the job market?

Such questions are so pressing, they seem to render the consideration of larger issues impractical. But as fires get put out and business is kept running as usual, the relevance of the larger questions does not recede.

We may not be asking the questions, but our programs are projecting answers nevertheless. Whether we intend it or not, learners receive our community's image of what constitutes a worthy life. To the degree that our conception of Jewish life is trivial or narrow, lacking in depth or scope, tepid or less than compelling, we ourselves unintentionally predispose students to develop a corresponding relationship to things Jewish.

Paradoxically, the concern with the organizational efficiency of our institutions might have a lulling effect on our engagement with Jewish education. Even growing day school enrolments do not necessarily point to deeper identification with Judaism. They might be attributed equally, if not more, to dissatisfaction with public education or fears about the lure of drug culture among suburban youth.

Nor does it help to point to those few charismatic educators and outstanding learners in our programs who are deeply engaged by Judaism. Through their achievements, we often allow ourselves to believe that "the system is working," but do we really evaluate the impact of our educational programs on a broader constituency of Jewish learners in our communities?

For each successful learner, how many have received a version of Jewish education that taught them that being Jewish is something that constantly limits their desire to explore worlds beyond the comfort zone of Jewish middle-class suburban life, or that it introduces constrictions upon their freedom to independently pick and choose the values and lifestyles of their everyday lives? How many of these learners become estranged from Jewish life after they graduate from our programs, or grant it an accordingly limited role in their lives?

We have not yet built a system of indicators that can genuinely gauge the level of impact our programs of Jewish education make on the personal lives of learners. Research shows higher institutional affiliations and lower rates of intermarriage among day school graduates, but even these external markers do not necessarily point to the internalization of a deeper Jewish message.

Nor do we need to rely on data about the demographic crisis or the decline of widespread, individual financial support for Jewish life, to be persuaded about the problematic state of affairs. The perennial ills of Jewish education provide sufficient evidence.

If we constantly lack resources, personnel, curricula and other basic components of a decent Jewish education, these deficiencies must be seen as symptoms of a deeper problem. However successful Jewish education might appear to be, this success is obviously not strong enough to produce a viable and vital basis for its own continuity. Having served a limited role in the lives of its learners, Jewish education receives limited support and status among them when they become adults, parents and citizens.

By making this argument, I do not mean to say what we need in Jewish education is simply more Judaism. Rather, we must admit that prevalent conceptions and practices of Jewish education are neither sufficiently reflective nor thorough enough to meet the challenges the world poses to a compelling and long-lasting Jewish existence. In other words, we have not satisfactorily defined the foundational meaning and substance of Judaism in our lives and have not given this definition genuine expression in our educational programs.

Viewed at this level, we might see the problem of Jewish education as one of the articulation of its fundamental purposes and means. It is hard to overestimate the practical significance of basing our efforts in Jewish education on a clear and compelling answer to the question, "What kind of person do we see as the ideal graduate of our efforts in Jewish education?" What is our image of "the educated Jew?"

It is critical to distinguish here between the pronounced rhetoric of Jewish education and the message its practice actually transmits to learners.

I often heard educators in the Jewish community speaking at celebratory events and ceremonies about the importance of being a mensch in the world, doing what is humane and morally right with no attention to what others will say or do.

Yet, many of us believed the clearer message we were being given was that our worth would be determined primarily according to the level of our social status and economic success.

Our frustration with the hypocrisy of this double message led us to nominate as our valedictorian a student who proudly flaunted the high grades he received through sophisticated and cunning means of cheating on exams.

The case for the articulation of a clearer, more coherent and more compelling guiding philosophy of Jewish education has been made before by educational leaders in the community. Its major proponent has been Seymour Fox, who, in various capacities over the past decades, has argued for serious reconsideration of the guiding ideas of Jewish education. In 1973, he said, "The most urgent problem facing Jewish education today is its lack of purpose, and consequently, its blandness… Until we engage in serious deliberation aimed at rectifying this state of affairs, we cannot even hope to deal with all the other issues that demand solution."

Over the last decade, I have had the great fortune to work with Fox on a Jewish educational endeavour that has put the larger questions of Jewish existence at the centre of its practical concerns. This effort was undertaken by the Mandel Foundation in Jerusalem as part of its larger program of activities aimed at improving Jewish education worldwide.

Alongside initiatives aimed at training a new cadre of Jewish educational leaders and at raising the status of Jewish education among community leaders in the Diaspora and Israel, the Mandel Foundation also focused on a fundamental rethinking of the ideas that can govern Jewish educational practice.

In part 2 of this article, I will describe this initiative and suggest how it might inspire new articulations of Jewish education.

Daniel Marom is director of Visions of Jewish Education at the Mandel Foundation in Jerusalem. He is a graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and the York University program in Jewish education.

What is religion for?

Recently someone remarked to me that religion is needed in the "trenches." In order to survive the difficult and even tragic events of our lives, he claimed, people need religion for answers and comfort. We are familiar with the popular notion that one cannot find an atheist in a foxhole.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Well, I understand, but I beg to differ.

It is true that many of us find reassurance and sustenance in our religious beliefs in times of crisis. But crises challenge those very beliefs. They do not automatically comfort: they make us face difficult issues in our own thinking and practice. There are certainly no easy answers!

So while I find religions of the world do attend to the tragic and frightening aspects of our lives, they do not solve everything! Au contraire, I think we need religion to help us celebrate and experience the joy of living.

Too many of us accept the good times as coming to us. We are shocked by tragedy but complacent about happiness. I am not saying that we do not experience joy and gladness at the good times; rather that we take it for granted, as our due. This sense of entitlement bewilders and distracts. It also sets us up for failure when coping with disaster.

Each moment of happiness should be seen as special, as a gift, as an incredible miracle even. Hence, the need for religion. Religion, in my case Judaism, not only instructs me to accept my life as a gift from God, it also instructs me how to celebrate. In fact it obligates me to do so. And I like that.

At one time, Jewish weddings consisted of four people – the marrying couple and two witnesses. We can imagine that many more people attended, but four is still the basic legal necessity. However, our sages understood the need for public ceremonial and confirmation. They instituted a requirement for a minyan at a wedding so that the community would be represented and, in a sense, present. (I will not now delve into the problematic masculine nature of that tradition.)

Rituals such as weddings and bar or bat mitzvah celebrations are essential because they make us "stop and smell the roses." They enable us to realize the "specialness" of the moment and force us to announce our gratitude. When we celebrate in a group, we make public these experiences and promote a sense of awe and privilege. We also concretize the event, creating hopeful memories and demonstrable communal support. These milestones, in turn, produce communal cohesion and confidence.

As people celebrate, rather than taking things for granted, they can engage in religious commitment, which in turn sanctifies their personal experience. In all humility, we are graced by the good times and should act accordingly.

Alone in the universe?

Reading the Jerusalem Report can be a real downer. It can instil a feeling of total helplessness, since most of what it reports (hence the name) is news – sometimes really bad news. Then there are days when it lifts you up, connecting things that have happened to you or around you in a way that challenges and refreshes.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

A riddle: what do the Dalai Lama, playwright Tony Kushner (Angels in America), and the Emperor Julian the Apostate have in common? Well, they are all in the May 3 Report, some in person, some in spirit. The riddle has a lot to do with a recent book by Robert Kirsch, God Against the Gods: the History of the War Between Monotheism and Polytheism, which is also reviewed in this issue.

The recent visit of the Dalai Lama to Vancouver and his encounters with Desmond Tutu, Shirin Ebadi and Rabbi Zalman Schachter-Shalomi were intense. They brought together three western monotheistic faiths and a very eastern, well, not monotheistic faith.

The Dalai Lama stressed compassion, the rabbi, the spiritual quest. The startling thing about the encounter was not the details of each participant's theology, but the fact that it happened at all.

Who could have foreseen this meeting 50 years ago? Or 25? In fact, when Rabbi Yitz and Blu Greenberg visited the Dalai Lama some years ago, it was considered revolutionary. Two respected Orthodox people consorting with – non-monotheists? Pretty heavy stuff. You can read about that encounter is Rodger Kamenetz's book The Jew in the Lotus.

Kirsch's book considers the chasm that separates monotheism from polytheism. Unlike Yehezkiel Kaufman in The Religion of Israel, Kirsch does not believe that monotheism was a slam-dunk for the ancient Israelites, but one that crept up on them very slowly. In fact, one gets the impression that Kirsch has a quiet fondness for polytheism, where the believer has a pretty wide choice in terms of to whom one should sacrifice or pray.

There is irony upon irony in his book. Under the Romans, Judaism was a despised but legal religion that flourished until the Jewish uprisings. Roman legions destroyed the Temple and its sacrificial service, a destruction that – more irony – led to the flourishing of rabbinic Judaism. Jews battled the polytheistic Roman Empire and lost, yet it was monotheism that triumphed just a few centuries later. The Emperor Constantine chose Christianity as the way to solidify his empire in the east, and his monotheism put Jews in jeopardy once again.

More irony: it was the Emperor Julian the Apostate – the name says it all – who for one brief moment slowed the drive towards state-mandated Christianity and under whose rule the Jews of the Byzantine Empire had a brief respite. So polytheism was once more a blessing to Judaism.

In other words, the dichotomy of monotheism versus polytheism is more complicated and needs more examination than we may have given it.

Here, Kirsch lays down a challenge. If the three monotheistic faiths fail to answer the deepest longings of the human spirit for contact with the Other, we will see more and more alternatives take hold. Kirsch cites Wicca and other neo-pagan beliefs that compete in the marketplace of religious ideas for people today. On the side of monotheism, fundamentalist groups in all three camps are having a very visible, and in many cases terrifying, resurgence.

This brings me to Tony Kushner. Gay, Jewish, agnostic and a genius of a playwright, he represents the very Jewish struggle with ideas that is vital to Judaism. You can't argue with 1,000 Buddhas, he says. There will always be one to take your point of view. Jews need someone to argue with. The final irony: Kushner may be more of a staunch monotheist – although a self-proclaimed agnostic – than many believers.

"Know before Whom you stand" is inscribed over many synagogue arks. It is a challenge, a command and a plea. Alas, we don't often know, we only hope someone is listening.

"Know" – reach up into some other dimension, whatever your beliefs. So we return to the dialogue with the Dalai Lama. It seems to be an innate longing of human beings to reach out to some invisible dimension where they will find a god, even a failed one. We can use a little dialogue with those who seek similar goals, whether they pray to one god or many.

No one wants to be alone in the universe.

'Go back where you came from'

I took part in a TV debate on Feb. 10 about the Middle East as senior counsel to B'nai Brith Canada, along with Israeli consul general Ya'acov Brosh and two Palestinian advocates, Jehad Aliweiwi and Hanadi Loubani.

The program, Michael Coren Live from 10 p.m. to 11 p.m., was too late for me. I live in Winnipeg and had come to Toronto for a court case. I had been in court all day. The debate was a shouting match, the Palestinians and the Israeli consul general talking over each other with gusto. I am not much of a shouter and I was in no mood for a harangue particularly that evening. So rather than try to be heard over the din of the others, I just waited my turn to speak, which did not come often and never lasted for very long.

David Matas in Winnipeg

What the Palestinian advocates said made little sense to me and I quickly forgot most of it. But one thing Aliweiwi said stuck in my mind, because it was just so peculiar. He said, "Go back where you came from."

What could he possibly have meant?

Why Aliweiwi would want me in Winnipeg rather than Toronto I could not fathom. As well, the remark seemed addressed to Brosh, too.

Did Aliweiwi want me to go back to the land of my ancestors, to Israel? Did he want the Israeli consul general to go back home? That did not make much sense to me, either. Palestinian advocates have a tendency to oppose the settling of Jews in Israel, not to encourage it.

What I suspect Aliweiwi was referring to was the part of anti-Zionist mythology that says Israel is an outpost of the West and that Jewish Holocaust survivors came from Europe to seize Arab lands and colonize Palestine. When he said, "Go back where you came from," he was referring neither to me nor to Brosh in particular, but to Jews in general. The "where you came from" he had in mind was post-Holocaust Europe.

If I am right in my interpretation of this remark, it betrays a number of wrong attitudes. First of all, it equates Jews everywhere to European-born Israelis. For those who wonder what the connection is between anti-Zionism and anti-Semitism, one need go no further than this remark.

Nor was it addressed to the individuals to whom it applied. It was addressed to me, a person living in Winnipeg. In Aliweiwi's eyes, a Jewish person living in Winnipeg is no different from a European Jewish Holocaust survivor who has moved to Israel. We are both "you."

Second, the remark assumes that Israelis came from outside the region. The notion of Israel as a colonial-settler country hangs on the assumption that the population comes from imperial states. But the demographic reality is that most Israeli Jews are people who fled Arab countries since the advent of Israel, and their descendants.

Third, requiring Holocaust survivors to live in the neighbourhood of their devastation is a human rights violation. The UN Refugee Convention states that a person ceases to be a refugee if circumstances have changed and the person is no longer in danger. But where there are compelling reasons arising out of previous persecution why the person should not go back, the person remains a refugee.

This compelling reasons proviso was inserted into the Convention with Holocaust survivors in mind. The drafters of the document realized it would be inhumane to force survivors to live among the murderers of their family, their friends and their community. So they stipulated that Holocaust survivors did not have to go back to where they came from. For Aliweiwi to say the opposite was cruel.

Well, I was far too tired to shout all that out on Feb. 10, even if I had thought of it at the time. But for those who may have watched the debate and are still wondering what to make of it, I hope this helps.

The Kirshner File

Emma Goldman was ahead of her times

I don't know about you, but until quite recently, I must admit, I confused Emma Lazarus with Emma Goldman, who were born two decades apart in the 19th century and lived in the United States. Now that I have seen Mel (Melissa) Bucklin's magnificent biopic, Emma Goldman: An Exceedingly Dangerous Woman, which was screened at the recent Toronto Jewish Film Festival, I doubt I will ever conflate the pair again.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Lazarus, who died in 1885, two years after Goldman's arrival in New York City, was a conformist and a poet. Her lyrical sonnet is engraved on the Statue of Liberty and is the acme of American patriotism. Goldman, an outspoken anarchist with revolutionary impulses, was a lecturer, pamphleteer, writer and publisher who pushed the limits of dissent in a free society. She fought for the emancipation of women, crusaded for birth control, sought to close the gap between rich and poor and opposed war. In 1919, along with 247 other foreign-born radicals, she was deported from the United States.

Since Goldman's death, a plethora of filmmakers, playwrights, biographers and scholars have focused on this subversive, uncompromising and romantic woman. Bucklin, a 47-year-old filmmaker on the staff of Nebraska Public Television, approached the topic in the full realization that Goldman's life had been picked apart minutely. Yet she was not deterred. "There is room for different interpretations," she said. "We have to keep the door open."

She first encountered Goldman while majoring in women's studies at the University of Nebraska in the 1970s. Subsequently, she stumbled upon Goldman in Warren Beatty's Hollywood film, Reds – in which Maureen Stapleton won an Academy Award for her portrayal of the feisty Goldman – and in the yellowing newspaper columns of Nellie Bly, a crusading journalist who interviewed Goldman in prison in 1893.

Intrigued by Goldman's role as an immigrant rabble rouser, political theorist and victim of America's first red scare, Bucklin began to explore Goldman's persona in archives and libraries, all in the hope of making a comprehensive film about her. "She raised people's consciousness and made them question their assumptions," said Bucklin, who started shooting shortly after the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks in the United States.

Although Bucklin does not share her politics, she is sympathetic to Goldman's anarchism. "Why should anyone obey anyone else? It's a profound question. Absolute and untrammelled freedom should be part of our thinking. We should question institutions and authorities. We need to pursue universal justice as we see fit. That's part of Goldman's Jewishness, though she was an atheist."

In Emma Goldman, there are no direct references to her Jewish origin, and in retrospect, she regrets this glaring omission. "I had only 80 minutes to tell her story, and in the editing room, a film takes on a life of its own," said Bucklin, who is of French, British and Swedish ancestry.

Bucklin, who describes Goldman as a "cultural Jew," has mixed feelings about her subject in the final analysis. "You end up loving her in many ways. She was an inspirational figure. She wanted a better world. But she was exasperating, an intellectual snob, and she used people. She was more lovable than likeable. If you had to spend a week with her, it would have been hard. Her friends said she was the worst bitch."

Goldman, then, was something of a paradox. She was extremely serious about her work, but at the same time, she was a hedonist, enjoying fine food, sex, dancing and fast cars. "She abandoned herself. So she might have been wonderful company."

Demonized by some Americans as an anarchist, Russian and Jew, Goldman was born in Kovno in 1869 and raised in Koenigsberg and St. Petersburg, the daughter of traditional Jews who forced her into an arranged marriage when she was in her teens.

She was 16, with only $20 in her pocket, when she immigrated to the United States – the brave new world of endless opportunities. Casting off her old life like a soiled garment, she dedicated herself to the promotion and dissemination of anarchism. She met Alexander Berkman, a fellow Russian Jew who had landed in the United States in 1888, and they became political soul mates and lovers.

No shrinking flower, Goldman also spoke in favour of other causes – free speech, prison reform, the eight-hour working day – that eventually were recognized as norms in modern American society. "The history of human growth is the history of every new idea heralding the approach of a brighter dawn, and the brighter dawn has always been considered illegal..." she observed in a pithy phrase.

A militant who aroused strong passions, Goldman organized mass meetings and hunger strikes. In theory, she rejected violence, but in practice, she endorsed it as an agent of change. By 24, she was widely regarded by friends and enemies alike as a compelling professional agitator and public speaker.

Goldman always thought the end justified the means. A philosophy that got her into trouble, she spent a year in jail after being charged with inciting violence. Later, much to her grief, she damaged the American anarchist movement by being associated with President William McKinley's assassin. He claimed he had been fired up by her ideas. In the wake of that painful incident, Goldman temporarily withdrew from politics and toiled as a nurse on the Lower East Side.

Mel Bucklin

In 1906, she founded Mother Earth – a magazine revered by anarchists – and resumed her special friendship with Berkman. Berkman, having shot and wounded steel magnate Henry Clay Frick in 1892 in a protest over his treatment of workers, had been condemned to hard labour. He languished in prison for 14 years.

Emma Goldman

Two years after Berkman was set free, Goldman entered into a steamy relationship with Ben Reitman, a hobo-turned- doctor who was compulsively unfaithful to her. In 1917, Reitman left her for a younger woman whom he married. She was devastated.

Goldman was a passionate proponent of birth control, which was illegal in the United States, but her persistent advocacy of women's rights across the board won her admirers in both working class and middle class circles.

Denouncing World War I as a clash between the forces of capitalism, Goldman urged the United States to stay out of that raging conflict and railed against conscription. The police raided her apartment and made off with papers and documents and the subscription list of Mother Earth, which was banned from the mails.

J. Edgar Hoover, the first director of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, described radicals like Goldman as "intellectual perverts." Francis Caffey, the U.S. attorney-general, was more nuanced. He considered Goldman "a woman of great ability and of personal magnetism, and her persuasive powers are such as to make her an exceedingly dangerous woman."

Accused of violating the Draft Act, she was jailed, serving 22 months behind bars. In 1919, during the notorious Palmer raids, she was rearrested and served with a deportation warrant. By then, she had been a resident of the United States for 34 years. Roused from her Ellis Island cell, she was packed off to the fledgling Soviet Union, whose Bolshevik Revolution she had hailed. Her fellow deportees included Berkman, labour union leaders, birth control advocates, socialists, war resisters and anarchists.

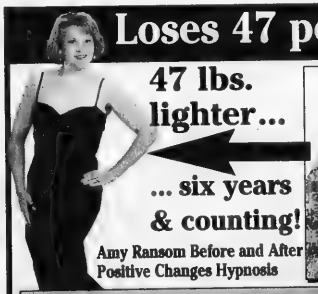
She and Berkman reached the Soviet Union in January 1920. The country was wallowing in hunger and disease. They were bitterly disappointed with the Soviet utopia. Lenin, the Soviet leader, granted them an audience. To their unrelieved horror, they learned that he dismissed free speech as a bourgeois notion and luxury. Normally a tough-minded person, Goldman had been incredibly naive.

Toward the close of 1921, she and Berkman left the Soviet Union, utterly disillusioned. "The hopes of the revolution had been traded for a new tyranny," said Bucklin. "It was one of her most crushing moments."

Being a persona non grata, she was unable to go back home. Goldman's dream had been to return to America. Rebuffed, she went to Britain before settling down in St. Tropez, France. She died in 1940, having spent her last months in Toronto and Winnipeg. In an ironical turn, she was buried in Chicago. At her funeral, Goldman's lawyer and friend, Harry Weinberger, delivered a moving eulogy in which he praised her as a progressive and a tireless, fearless dreamer of liberty.

The fundamental issues she elevated into a national discourse, from the right to dissent to the right to oppose autocracy, are as relevant today as they were in Goldman's heyday, Bucklin said. "Her life is so contemporary."

Loses 47 pounds and "My husband can't keep his eyes off me"



Amy Ransom Before and After Positive Changes Hypnosis

I lost 47 pounds with hypnosis. Six pounds the first week. Fifteen pounds the first month. My dress size plunged from a 16 to a 10. It was that easy. I feel great.

Overweight hurts. I tried everything. Shakes, prepackaged foods, support groups and stupid diets. With every diet I only lost more self-control.

Food was my life. I lived on fast food. I avoided the beach. I resented the other wives in their skimpy bikinis.

That all changed when I enrolled in Positive Changes Hypnosis. My weight loss was fast, easy and effortless. No cravings, NO DIETS, NO DRUGS.

Call Positive Changes Hypnosis today. Don't suffer one more minute."

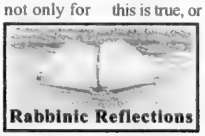
Jewish Life

Our great national pastime

By RABBI YECHIEL M. GOLDREICH



It isn't hockey or making money, watching television sitcoms or even reading Internet news reports about Israel. Our great national pastime is, was and always will be Torah study – and not only for rabbis. They are just the paid professionals of the game.

The definition of "Jew" really should read "Torah learner." (True, a few other technical details could get you a seat at the table, but if you aren't involved in this pastime why bother?)

Torah study has its players, vital statistics, strategies, legends of the game, drama and passion. Parents hope their child will grow up to be the next "great one." Buddies chat about Torah when they get together at a barbecue.

Purists tell us that the golden age of this pastime has passed, that the kids these days don't seem to be as excited about it as the old-timers once were, that money interests are ruining a good thing. Perhaps this is true, or perhaps people have always spoken this way.

Torah study is our great national pastime, but it is also more than that. It is a Divine directive – the first conversation we have in the afterlife will be about Torah study – and it is also good for us.

It makes us wiser, more insightful, more sensitive and arguably more decent – although it can't entirely cure you if you are a jerk. The Talmud itself states that common courtesy comes before Torah. Nor will Torah study make a person wealthy or endow the learner with great physical strength. (Actually, financial gain from Torah study is seen by the Torah as a negative thing, rabbis notwithstanding. When a pastime becomes a job, it's not the same anymore.) But manners, muscles and money aside, it's hard to find a better activity in which to be involved than Torah study.

It guides us, challenges us and gives us something interesting to do to keep us out of mischief.

This Shavuot, pick up a book of the Torah and enjoy the greatest national pastime a person can want. Erev Shavuot is, after all, the time of "tikkun leil Shavuot," when it is our tradition to study all night.

For, as we say in our daily evening prayer, "It [the Torah] is our life and the length of our days and about it we will meditate day and night."

Rabbi Goldreich is assistant rabbi of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation in Toronto.

A day in the life

By ED MORGAN

Like so many days in Israel, last week, Saturday was one of contrasts. I spent the day in Haifa and the night in Tel Aviv, and in the process, witnessed two demonstrations that are together emblematic of the complexity of Israeli political life.

The morning saw the Arab communities of northern Israel and the Galilee marking the annual return of what is called in Arabic Al-Naqba, the day of disaster, exercising their right of free speech by filling the streets of Haifa with the green and white banners of the Islamic movement. The day commemorates the exodus of thousands of Arab residents during the 1948 conflict that accompanied the founding of the state.

While Arab citizens of Israel marched in Haifa, the towns of the West Bank were festooned with Palestinian flags. Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat himself gave the speech that led off the evening news, calling emphatically for implementation of what he dubbed the sacred right of Palestinian return.

Just over an hour down the coast, Rabin Square in downtown Tel Aviv was filled to the brim by what was labelled a Peace Now demonstration. The irony, however, was that the crowd endorsed Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in a way that would have been unthinkable for the Israeli left just a short time ago. Their placards proclaimed, "We're with you, Arik."

The peace demonstrators, reportedly 100,000 strong, called for a withdrawal from Gaza at the end of a week that saw 11 young soldiers killed hunting smugglers' tunnels and munitions factories in the violent strip. Former prime minister Shimon Peres gave the speech that took second place in the evening news, emphatically declaring the peace camp's victory over the 60,000 Likud members who voted a week ago to reject the prime minister's proposal to withdraw from substantial parts of the territories.

Now that Sharon, the former Mr. Not-One-Inch, is in full flight as Peres' peace partner, and Arafat, Peres' fellow Nobel Prize winner, is leading the rejectionist camp, one wonders what surprise will be next.

I have been teaching a course in international criminal law at Haifa University, and after each class, I seem to think that now I've seen it all. The class is about 80 per cent Jews-20 per cent Arabs, 50 per cent right-50 per cent left, and 100 per cent wise beyond their years. The debate over issues ranging from terrorism to war crimes is as feisty and free, if not more so, as any I have encountered on campuses elsewhere.

The study in contrasts continued when I turned on the evening news, deftly flipping back and forth, in my practised North American way, between CNN, Israel's Channel 2 and my fridge, when two parallel interviews caught my eye. The first was with the Givati Brigade commander under whom nine of this week's casualties had served, and then, almost as if the international station knew what the local competition would air, I caught an interview with a military police officer attached to U.S. forces in Iraq.

The difference between the two uniformed characters could not have been more stark. It was not just that the Israeli officer's stoicism was matched by his American counterpart's complaints, or that the former's internal debate about the political and existential quagmire was paired with the latter's lack of a political clue or an ideological care. What was truly remarkable was that throughout the interview, the U.S. soldier was anxious to describe her admittedly bleak situation and ask, "What's in it for me?" while the Israeli constantly questioned his squad's admittedly bleak situation and asked, "What choice is there for us?"

Needless to say, not all Israeli youths are immersed in rabbinic-style debate and many Americans do not ask what their country can do for them. However, there is something about this week's images of soldiers in full combat gear down on all fours searching the sands of Rafiah for the scattered body parts of their comrades that is hard to compare to anything else going on in the world. No amount of imitation hip-hop in Hebrew on the local MTV can disguise the depths of thought and emotion that life or, for that matter, death, in this country embody.

But then, not everyone sticks together in the land of milk and honey. Friday morning, I visited a friend from academic circles who lives at the very hip epicentre of the Shenkin Street artists' district. It is here that the cute and the kitsch mingle with the lurid and the decadent in a way that is prototypically and uniquely Tel Aviv.

As we walked by the craft stands lining Nahalat Binyamin, two black-coated gentlemen from Chabad Lubavitch did what they do everywhere from New York to London to Moscow: they asked us to put on tfillin and recite a few words to our maker.

At that moment, I was more into shopping than davening, so I politely declined. At the same time, my colleague swore under his breath and told me how he felt about "those people" in a way that took me aback. Had he been a Canadian professor in an encounter on Bathurst Street, I would be wondering how to expel my gentle Labor party friend from the university.

As I rode back to my apartment in Haifa late Saturday night, I listened to a translation of Arafat's speech on the radio. I was particularly struck by his double-barrelled quote from the Qur'an, on one hand exhorting his listeners to "find what strength you have to terrorize your enemy," while on the other hand telling them that "if they want peace, then let's have it."

At that moment, I passed by a banner hanging from a balcony that proclaimed in Hebrew, "We're all settlers." This statement, too, had a double meaning. Israelis are currently asking themselves whether they support or oppose a continued presence in Gaza. Either way, however, they are keenly aware that for their harshest enemies, the battle doesn't end at the border, it only begins there.

Jews of Rembrandt's Amsterdam

Rembrandt's Jews*, by Steven Nadler, University of Chicago Press $40.

Jews who lived in 17th-century Amsterdam were fortunate; they faced few restrictions. They could practise Judaism freely, live wherever they chose and dress like their contemporaries. They were able to develop a vigorous civic, cultural and economic exchange with their Christian neighbours.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Vlooienburg, the centre of Amsterdam's art market and lumber trade, was also the heart of Amsterdam's Jewish world. And Rembrandt settled right at its center.

Nadler points out that "every house immediately contiguous with or facing [Rembrandt's] own was owned or occupied by a Jew. And an overwhelming majority of the households on his block, on both sides of the street, were Jewish. From his front stoop he could see into Rabbi Mortera's window; from his top floor he had a view of the community's synagogue. He could not help but hear the sons of Jewish families chattering in Portuguese on their way to school in the morning. On Friday afternoon, he could smell the slow-cooking Iberian foods they prepared for the Sabbath."

In choosing neighbourhood Jewish models, Rembrandt painted, etched and drew a remarkable number and variety of figures from the Torah and other Jewish biblical writings: Abraham, Hagar, Ishmael, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Benjamin, Moses, Samson, Hannah, Samuel, Saul, David, Bathsheba, Mordecai, Esther, Haman, Balaam, Tobit, Daniel – the list goes on and on.

The author writes, "Many of the paintings are moving, deeply felt works. They come across not merely as illustrations of Old Testament scenes, but as highly humanized, even personal portraits drawn from a deep familiarity with Hebrew literature. While other artists painted the Bible, Rembrandt painted Jewish Scripture."

Steven Nadler, a professor of Jewish Studies at the University of Wisconsin, points out that Jews, like many of their neighbours, bought and displayed paintings in their homes and offices. It is astonishing that, by one estimate, there were close to five million paintings produced by thousands of painters in Holland in the 17th century. This is an extraordinary number, especially since the total population of the republic was only around 800,000 individuals.

But what about the second of the Ten Commandments that warned "You shall not make for yourselves a graven image or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, on the earth below or in the water under the earth?" This injunction was interpreted by Amsterdam rabbis to refer to only the worship of idols.

Rabbi Saul Levi Mortera ruled that Jews could own works of art – both two and three-dimensional – since they were not in and of themselves idols. And in a written work on the question titled "On the Use of the Painters," Rabbi Moses d'Aguilar saw no reason to ban painted images in the homes of Amsterdam's Portuguese community. He did, however, recommend restraint and good sense.

Moving beyond Rembrandt and art, the author discusses the complex relationship between Dutch and Jewish cultures and some of the remarkable Jewish personalities of the time. These included Menasseh ben Israel, Rabbis Saul Levi Mortera and Isaac Aboah da Fonseca, the unfortunate Uriel Acosta, and most importantly, Sabbatai Zevi, the false messiah.

Zevi, who announced that the long awaited Redemption would occur June 18, 1666, was venerated in various parts of the Middle East and Europe. Many communities were gripped by a messianic frenzy. Amsterdam Jews fell hard. No community devoted more energy and resources to the Sabbatean movement than the Vlooienburg contingent.

Of course, it all ended in disaster when Zevi was given the choice between death and becoming a Muslim. In September 1666, the Messiah converted to Islam.

This is an enlightening study of Rembrandt and his relationship with the Jews of Amsterdam, as well as the history of an unusual and tolerant community and some of its most significant and colourful figures.

Jewish MP3s, part 1: Torah on the go

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

You see them everywhere. People walk, jog and shop while listening to their portable MP3 players. You assume they're listening to music, but they could be listening to something else, even to a Gemarah lesson. Over the next few weeks, I'll take you to websites with great Jewish MP3s that you can download easily and legally – and listen to anytime, even when you're not connected to the Internet. (But before I do, thanks to Marc Friedman of Thornhill, Ont. for suggesting the topic.)

Now the legal part. Although they didn't discuss MP3s in the Talmud, Rabbi Dr. Asher Meir of the Business Ethics Center of Jerusalem says today's copyright issues aren't really new. "Copying a song from the Internet is like making a detour around a toll both. Even if you don't get a ticket, you've taken a free ride on someone else's expense. Our sages viewed paying tolls as a prime example of the citizen's duty to obey the law, and emphasized the importance of avoiding even the appearance of evading this duty" [http://tinyurl.com/33 ufa].

Of course, our legal systems are still grappling with downloading, and some courts have delivered wide-ranging verdicts on its legality [http://tinyurl. com/244k3]. So for the purpose of these columns, I am going to stick to websites whose creators want you to download their material. Most often they do so because they hope if you like the free song, you'll pay to hear more. Regardless, virtually all sites that allow downloading stipulate that their work can only be used for personal, non-commercial use.

And now a technical note. It is beyond the scope of this column to explain how to download the MP3s and get them onto a portable device (or burn them on a CD). However, I will say I have used Apple's free iTunes on both a PC and a Mac and have found it easy to operate [www.apple.com/itunes/]. Here's a link for some alternative software MP3 players, mostly free [www.mp3cafe.net/mp3-players.shtml]. And one technical tip: when you find an MP3 file you'd like to download, don't click on it. Rather, right-click on it and save it to your hard drive. Find the file on your hard drive and double-click on it. That should launch your MP3 software. As for purchasing a portable player, there are many models to choose from, including Nomad, Rio and the ubiquitous iPod. Many have accessories that also let you listen through your car's stereo [http://tinyurl.com/3425f].

The next time you complain you'd like to attend more Jewish classes but just don't have the time, think again. Hundreds of classes are available online, and you can download them to your computer and burn and listen to them almost anywhere. TeachItToMe offers "Gigs of Audio and Video Torah," ranging from an Introduction to Tehilim (Psalms) to HaRav Moshe Chaim Luzzato's Path of the Just to the fundamentals of Hebrew Grammar [www.teachittome.com/classes/]. TorahWeb presents talks on Jewish Parenting, Spirituality and Affluence, and one called Who has Time? [www.torahweb.org/torah/audio/]

Try TorahZone.com [www.torahzone.com/links/Audio.htm], the Chabad Daily Study Center [www.chabad.org /dailystudy] and "Digital Torah: the Reason for MP3." That's how MP3shiur.com greets you on its home page [www.mp3shiur.com].

People who have decided to learn Daf Yomi, a daily page of Gemarah, can catch up on a day's portion through the Daf Yomi website [www.dafyomi.org/].

Unlike the above sites, Aish HaTorah's AishAudio allows free online listening, but charges for downloads from its extensive searchable database [www.aishaudio.com/]. Although I've been focusing on sites with free downloads, I did want to mention AishAudio's press release called, "File Swappers Will Not Be Prosecuted" [http://tinyurl.com/2h4t9]. AishAudio's Rabbi Aaron Dayan knows unauthorized duplication happens. But rather than taking the legal route, he probably stops more downloads with a few well-chosen words: "Anyone who would steal Torah classes must really need the wisdom and moral understandings."

Jack Chisvin's passion builds pride and presence for Jewish student life

Wolfond Centre officially opens its doors

By ROCHELLE KAHN
UJA Federation

There are many reasons why the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, which officially opened earlier this month, is attracting attention. Crowning the historic hub of Jewish Toronto at Harbord and Huron Streets, the centre offers a comfortable home away from home for Jewish students at the University of Toronto, with programming in spacious surroundings. The facility is architecturally outstanding and lays claim to being the first Canadian Hillel headquarters constructed fresh from the ground up.

But the most exceptional aspect of the Wolfond Centre, an important component of the new Tomorrow Campaign initiated by UJA Federation, is the passion behind it – a force as responsible for its creation as the project's capital funding. The heart and soul of that passion is one of our community's most enduring and inspirational leaders, Jack Chisvin – a former UJA Federation of Greater Toronto President.

Jack Chisvin

Chisvin's reputation as an internationally celebrated electrical engineer, combined with his unfailing willingness to support community initiatives, landed him the job of volunteer project manager for the centre, quite to his own surprise. "I had given some professional advice to the organizing committee early on," he explained, "but when David Gotfrid (past chair, Hillel of Greater Toronto) introduced me at the ground-breaking as project manager, I laughed. I thought he was joking."

Gotfrid wasn't, and some five years and thousands of volunteer hours later, Chisvin is still laughing, still enthralled with the centre and what it means for Jewish student life. His own Hillel connections are strong and personal, an early influence on his community activism. Hillel was, in fact, the matchmaker that introduced him to Phyllis, his wife of fifty years.

"There's a real déjà vu in my experience with Wolfond," Chisvin observed. "In the 40's, when I was studying in Winnipeg, Jewish students were marginalized. Establishing Hillel at the university enabled us to find our collective voice and promoted a vital Jewish presence - exactly what the centre will do for some 4,500 Jewish youth on Toronto campuses today and those to follow through the years ahead."

The centre's cornerstone is inscribed with a carefully selected Hillel quote, 'if you come to my house, I will come to yours.' Chisvin explained that, just as the architecture of this campus landmark had to reflect Jewish pride, its atmosphere needed to convey an open door message to all.

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life was designed by Toronto architect Susan Friedrich. It will be featured in the upcoming Doors Open Toronto tour of prominent city sites, May 29 and 30.

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life recently held its official opening. At the event, the building's cornerstone was unveiled by lead benefactors (l-r) Mel, Pedie, Chad, Greg, and Henry Wolfond.

More than 300 community members attended the centre's official opening earlier this month, with a special program that included a celebration to lay the building's cornerstone and the dedication of a special donor wall.

Helping Terror victims in Israel

Students at United Synagogue Day School, Bathurst Campus, are learning the true meaning of tzedakah and mitzvot. They recently raised $14,000 for victims of terror and school security in Israel through the USDS Hakesher fund, chaired by parents Ellen Chaikoff and Anna Schwartz. Students having a bar or bat mitzvah asked their classmates to make donations to the fund in lieu of gifts. UJA Federation Campaign Director Jeff Springer recently accepted a cheque from the Hakesher fund, which will be added to UJA Federation allocations for Israeli terror victims and school security. Pictured (l-r) are: Jeff Springer; USDS Bathurst students Chelsey Schwartz, Erin Yunger, Jordan Tannenbaum, Bryan Flatt, Ben Silverstein and Michael Chaikof.

Computer centre builds skills and confidence

The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living has a reputation for listening carefully to its community's seniors, working hard to find new ways to serve their needs. So when a survey last year of 700 area seniors pointed out a strong desire for computer training, the response was swift and determined.

Like most of its projects, Betel's Computer Learning and Resource Centre was a cooperative effort, backed by a number of enthusiastic partners. The Ontario Trillium Foundation donated partial funding, augmented by a special grant as well as ongoing annual support for the centre from UJA Federation. Bernard Betel's Board of Directors was so excited about the initiative that members personally contributed a substantial portion of the funds needed to outfit the new computer facility.

Jennifer MacLeod, Betel's coordinator of computer services, is proud of this dynamic resource and how it has affected the lives of centre members. "Time and again, I hear the same story," MacLeod explained. "Participants start off feeling apprehensive and skeptical that we can actually teach 'someone like them.' After the very first success – something as simple as being able to send an e-mail – their self-esteem rockets and they start having fun."

What sets the Betel Centre course apart from similar seniors' offerings is two-fold, according to MacLeod. "Starting with how to turn on the computer, we don't assume any initial knowledge and this lack of expectation really promotes confidence." Additionally, MacLeod noted special features built into the classroom setting, all geared to make the experience as easy and successful as possible.

"The instructor's computer is connected to a large screen, visible to all, which means everyone is literally on the same page at the same time," she said. "Each class of 12 students has three or four centre volunteers available to provide individual attention. Our computers are state-of-the art, including large, LCD flat monitors to prevent eye strain." Even the chairs were selected with the ergonomic needs of the senior student in mind.

Seniors go high-tech at the new Computer Learning and Resource Centre at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living.

The Bernard Betel Computer Learning and Resource Centre offers a variety of courses, ranging from its popular Computer Discovery program for beginners to more advanced programs on Word and the Internet. Full and partial scholarships are available to Betel Centre members. For course information and registration details, contact Jennifer MacLeod, coordinator of computer services, at 416-225-2112.

Walk against hate at the Walk with Israel

By ROCHELLE KAHN
UJA Federation

At a time when Toronto's Jewish community has faced some of the most difficult incidents of antisemitic hatred in recent memory, the UJA Federation Walk with Israel on May 30, our community's popular annual event now in its 34th year, is more meaningful than ever, says Walk Chair Peter Ekstein.

This year's Walk with Israel is expected to draw more than 20,000 participants.

"The world has changed dramatically since the 2003 Walk. It's more important than ever that we stand together as a community, in support of Israel and against hatred and antisemitism," said Ekstein, who is chairing the walk with David Peltz. "The Walk is an opportunity for us to show Israel, our government, and all of Toronto that we care, by being there," he added.

Peltz stressed the importance of participating in the Walk as a show of community solidarity against hatred. "Historically, as Jews, we have always reacted strongly against racism of any kind. We cannot be tolerant of hatred in any form."

Ekstein, Peltz and a burgeoning crew of dedicated volunteers and UJA Federation professionals have devoted hundreds of hours preparing for the Walk, which is expected to attract more than 20,000 participants. Proceeds from the day will assist Israel's victims of terror and other vulnerable Israelis.

For the first time, Toronto Police Chief Julian Fantino will be leading the walk. "Chief Fantino's participation powerfully underscores this year's dual message – come out to walk with Israel and walk against hate," said UJA Federation Campaign Director Jeff Springer.

This year's Walk offers an opportunity to perform an added mitzvah. Dr. Gordon Arbess will be coordinating an on-site bone marrow drive at the RioCan Festival at Ontario Place following the Walk. One simple swab, applied to the inside of your cheek, may be all it takes to give hope to a patient in urgent need of a transplant.

Join the Walk with Israel, Sunday, May 30. The party begins at 9:30 at Coronation Park, across from the CNE's Princes' Gates.

Starting off at 9:30 with a pre-Walk party at Coronation Park, across from the CNE's Princes' Gates, and ending at RioCan Festival at Ontario Place, the Walk with Israel covers much of historic downtown Toronto. The route will include new checkpoints with carnival games, activities and refreshments.

There's something for everyone on Sunday, May 30, with: a Meet your Match feature, co-sponsored by JDate; a Guinness Book of World Records challenge to create the world's largest hora; lively entertainment; an Israeli-style shuk; exciting raffles and prize draws that will include a trip to Israel courtesy of El Al Israel Airlines; and a kosher barbeque.

Terrorism expert Schanzer: fighting a "different kind of war"

By WENDY LAMPERT
UJA Federation

According to terrorism expert Jonathan Schanzer, the situation in Iraq is not a typical war.

"Traditionally, wars are fought against an ideology or a country. We're fighting a different kind of war. We're fighting a tactic – terror."

The former terrorism analyst at The Washington Institute for Near East Policy briefed community members at a lunch sponsored by UJA Federation's Young Lawyers Division following a recent trip to Iraq, where he met with al-Qaeda prisoners and a former intelligence officer for Saddam Hussein's regime. The trench warfare being waged by the U.S. in Iraq, he said, is the wrong way to fight the war on terror.

Schanzer said it is important to distinguish between moderate followers of Islam, and the 15 to 20 percent of Muslims who follow a radical view of their faith. "This is a twisted way of looking at a religion which isn't inherently violent," he said. The problem is that the moderate voices are drowned out by the radicals. "We know the Yassir Arafats, the Saddam Husseins and the Osama bin Ladens, but we don't know the moderates."

The U.S. also doesn't have a firm enough understanding of the radicals or the structure of their operations, he noted. "You can't win a war until you figure out exactly who you're fighting."

Since the terror attacks of 9/11, the structure of al-Qaeda has changed, and no longer has a top-down configuration, noted Schanzer. "Al-Qaeda was Terrorism Incorporated, Osama bin Laden was the CEO, and the smaller cells were franchises. Since 9/11, the corporate headquarters are gone, but the franchises are still there. This is al-Qaeda 2.0," Schanzer said.

The cells are doing the same work – they have the same training, money and radical view, but are now self-directed. It's what Schanzer calls the "affiliate phenomenon," and it's what's going to make the war on terror even harder to fight.

"We didn't recognize the extent to which al-Qaeda had gone global, or this current shift. There are cells in Yemen, Algeria, Egypt, and northern Iraq. There are even cells in Canada working with affiliate groups," he said.

But Schanzer does hold out hope. He said Iraq "was supposed to be the next al-Quaeda front," but that doesn't seem to have materialized. Based on what he saw during his trip to Iraq, there are only a few thousand radicals fighting the American soldiers – a much smaller number than when al-Qaeda fought the Soviet Union.

The fight against terror is going to get worse before it gets better, Schanzer said. And countries like Canada, which traditionally maintains neutrality, won't be able to do so any longer.

"There is going to be a more extensive battle in the future. In the next few years, countries are going to have to decide where they stand on this issue."

Options in charitable giving

More than 125 lawyers, accountants, financial planning and insurance professionals learned the latest about avenues for charitable giving at a recent breakfast program sponsored by the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto's Professional Advisory Committee (PAC). Participants heard from experts on a variety of charitable giving opportunities, including insurance and annuities, publicly traded securities, private company shares and real estate. During the program, outgoing PAC Chair Barry Corbin (l) received an award from Neil Nisker (r), Chair of the Jewish Foundation's Board of Trustees, in recognition of his outstanding leadership.

Author heckled during speaking engagement at Chapters

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A low-key speaking engagement by an author at a Waterloo Chapters has spun wildly out of control, with threats of a lawsuit, allegations of racism and concerns over an author's personal safety.

Author and lawyer Howard Rotberg said he is consulting with legal counsel about a possible libel suit against Indigo Books & Music Inc., which operates the Chapters chain, over a news release that suggests he made racist comments when confronted with hecklers at a Sunday afternoon lecture.

"I categorically deny I said anything racist," Rotberg told The CJN.

Indigo is standing by its news release, said Sorya Ingrid Gaulin, director of public relations and regional marketing for the bookseller. The release states in part, "We are saddened that our customers witnessed inappropriate behaviour and heard racist comments both from the guest author and some of the attendees at this particular event."

'Very traumatic event'

The unlikely series of events began last week as Rotberg, a lawyer and author of a pro-Israel novel, The Second Catastrophe, was addressing a small group at an in-store lecture. About 20 minutes into his address, two men who later identified themselves as a Palestinian and a Iraqi Kurd appeared and began to heckle him. They were asked to sit down and keep their comments for a question period at the end of the talk, but soon the lecture disintegrated as the hecklers disrupted the author's talk with claims his book labels all Muslims as terrorists.

Rotberg denies his book does so, saying it was the hecklers who introduced the idea to the afternoon event.

"They wouldn't let me speak," Rotberg said. When one member of the audience told the heckler to let the author continue, the Iraqi heckler said, "He's a fucking Jew."

At that point, Rotberg raised his voice, and "I yelled back and said you can't call me a fucking Jew. The manager said, 'You can't swear in a family store,' and escorted me to a back room."

Rotberg insisted they contact police, and after they hesitated to do so at first, management called 911. An officer arrived, interviewed the two hecklers but rejected Rotberg's request they be charged with causing a disturbance.

When Rotberg insisted the officer charge the men, the officer said, "You don't get any special treatment because you're an author," he recounted.

Rotberg is angry at the response of Chapters and police, "who would not intervene for me… when one of the two guys said words to the effect that [I] have no right to speak if [I am] going to say these things about Israel."

Compounding the incident, Rotberg said, was the Indigo news release with its allegation of racism. "They have attempted to ruin my reputation after Gestapo tactics by Islamist gentlemen who don't believe I have the right to make a speech," he said.

Gaulin said the bookseller stands behind its news release. She said she has five written statements from store employees who will corroborate the statement's allegation, but she declined to specify what comment by Rotberg could be considered racist.

Gaulin said Rotberg, along with store staff and the Indigo home office, had experienced a "very traumatic event," one "we are treating very seriously."

She said the hecklers were escorted from the store and told never to come back. "Staff acted properly and took every measure to ensure it didn't escalate into physical violence," she said.

Dennis Stoutenburg, a professor in the Jewish studies program at the University of Waterloo who attended the lecture, said "I heard everything he [Rotberg] said. I heard no racist comments from him.

"The Palestinian man first charged him with the claim [allegedly in his book] that all Muslims are terrorists. Howard then denied that."

Stoutenburg believes the alleged racist comment "was an unsubstantiated claim from a member of the audience."

When Stoutenburg told the Iraqi that the store was full of books containing divergent views, "he went into a rant that America and Israeli policies were terrorist and the whole sense of democracy was fascist, and he was yelling as loud as he could. And then he turned to Howard and said, 'He's a fucking Jew,'" Stoutenburg said.

Stoutenburg added that it did not appear the book store was prepared to handle that sort of incident.

Ajax shul celebrates its 10th anniversary

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Harley Saltzman moved to Ajax in 1984, he thought he had moved "beyond the pale" of Jewish settlement. He was not aware of many other Jewish people living in the vicinity.

In 1993, he was standing in line at the local gardening centre when the owner told him about an informal network called Jewish Families of Durham Region, made up of about 30 local families who come together to celebrate Purim and Chanukah.

At the next Chanukah celebration, Saltzman asked the group members if they wanted to start a synagogue. They expressed interest in establishing a Reform congregation, recalls Saltzman, the founding president of B'nai Shalom V'Tikvah.

Today the shul is a thriving institution with more than 50 member families, a rabbi, cantor, Sunday school, youth group, adult education program and cemetery. The congregation holds regular Shabbat services, holiday celebrations and bar and bat mitzvahs. This weekend, the shul marks its 10th anniversary with a special Shabbat service 9 a.m. on May 29 at St. Paul's United Church and a gala party on May 30.

Saltzman says one of the congregants, a key person who worked closely with Saltzman to get the new shul established, happened to be the former president of Temple Israel in Ottawa.

"Eli Edelson was transferred out here for business. Rabbi Gottlieb – he's now the spiritual leader of Temple Kol Ami – introduced me to Eli. He was the one with all experience and I was the schlep who didn't know what he was getting into."

Rabbi Gottlieb, then executive director of Canadian Council of Reform Judaism (CCRJ) lead the congregation's first official service, held at a local golf and curling club in May 1994, Saltzman says.

"Our MP Dan McTeague attended the inaugural service. He was the second to arrive and I immediate had him help schlep in the food into the hall."

A Reform rabbi from New York led the first High Holy Day services, which were held at Ajax Community Centre. Some 60 people attended.

Saltzman says B'Nai Shalom V'Tikvah was fortunate in finding a Torah recently. It had had one on loan from the CCRJ for about seven years, which came from a synagogue that had closed.

"We went on the Internet to search for one. The U.S. army replaces Torahs with new ones, but we had no success. We looked in Israel, but the prices were out of reach. The army Torahs were cheaper."

When the congregation brought its Torah to a scribe to be repaired, the scribe happened to be repairing another Torah in his possession, Saltzman said.

"There it was on his work table. It was much more affordable. He got it ready for synagogue use… A year ago, we introduced it on Shavuot."

The congregation also has a Torah on permanent loan from Temple Emanu-el until another congregation needs it, Saltzman says.

"Two years ago, we paraded in their Torah. Their rabbi, Debra Landsberg, and their president were part of the ceremonies."

Saltzman says the Durham congregation has also benefited over the years from the support of many spiritual leaders and visiting rabbis, including Cantor Anna Trubashnik, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, Rabbi Gottlieb, Rabbi Barbara Borts, Rabbi Paul Golomb, Rabbi Jerry Steinberg and Cantor Deborah Staiman.

"We've had some phenomenal people with us for the High Holy days plus the rabbis for monthly services."

Rabbi Steinberg, the current rabbi of B'Nai Shalom V'Tikvah, has led the congregation for the last three years and like its previous spiritual leaders, he runs monthly Shabbat services and is available for special occasions, says Saltzman.

"He is very interactive. We always have a Torah study breakfast before service. We get as many as 30 to 40 people attending services in the winter."

The congregation has also been lucky in finding an education director from the area for its Sunday school, says Saltzman, noting that Ron King is a certified teacher and an experienced religious educator.

"He had taught at Holy Blossom for years. He's been the architect of our course curriculum.

"He is probably one of our greatest unsung heroes in the entire congregation. He's been a mover and shaker. He was instrumental in starting the youth group."

Saltzman says the shul's Hebrew teachers live in the area as well.

B'Nai Shalom V'Tikvah generally holds services at St. Paul's United Church in Ajax and has a close relationship with its congregation, he says, adding they hold interfaith programs during Holocaust Education Week and invite the church congregation to events, which include the second communal seder on alternate years.

Indeed, the synagogue will recognize the church for its support at its upcoming anniversary celebration, Saltzman says.

The Saturday morning service, which takes place at the church, will be followed by a catered lunch. Saltzman expects 120 people to attend the Sunday gala, which will include dinner and live music.

Saltzman, who is now the shul's ritual director, has held many volunteer positions at the shul.

"Everyone pitches in. That's the nature of our congregation and it makes for a much more closely-knit congregational family."

For more information about B'Nai Shalom V'Tikvah and its 10th anniversary celebrations, call Saltzman at 416-446-0925 or e-mail him at harleysaltzman@bellnet.ca.

Troupe uses puppets to fight sexism, discrimination

By ELYSSE ZAREK

Sitting in the gym in the Kingsview Village Public School in Etobicoke, Joanne is upset that she can't sew a patch onto her soccer jersey for the first out-of-town competition.

Nam offers to help her out. "I'll sew the patch on for you, Joanne," says Nam.

Joanne sighs. She looks dejected.

Members of The Concerned Kids and their puppets

"Thanks for the offer Nam, but you can't. It's a girl thing. Some things are boy things and some things are girl things," she says.

Joanne and Nam are waist-high talking puppets manipulated by members of The Concerned Kids, a non-profit social-action puppet troupe that tackles serious issues like sexism and discrimination through the multicultural, three-foot dolls.

Fidgeting on the gym floor are nearly 100 elementary school children who came with their teachers to learn a few things about diversity, tolerance, and why both boys and girls can sew patches or play soccer if they want to.

The puppet show is a pilot project started six months ago by the Black and Jewish Dialogue, one of the sub-groups of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights, and The Concerned Kids. It is designed to teach kids aged six to 12 about diversity, and how to deal with classmates' differences while still being friends.

Because of increases in immigration and shifts in the city's demographics, Toronto's classrooms are more diverse than ever before, and the need for these types of programs is becoming apparent, says Heather deSilva, managing director of The Concerned Kids.

"We've had schools call us and say that we need to come to their school because it's so multicultural, but every school is like this now," says deSilva.

"People in the city are very aware that multiculturalism is here. If we don't learn how to deal with it then there will be problems. In light of the anti-Semitism, this is really needed."

Lorne Foster, director of the Black and Jewish Dialogue, is optimistic that the program will help kids understand how to accept and respect differences.

"We have never been able to reach the younger generation. This is our first foray into that arena," says Lorne Foster, director of Black and Jewish Dialogue. "Puppets that are Muslim and Jewish further promote the ideas of fighting intolerance and prejudice."

Two of the puppeteers are black Muslims, and three are Jews. One of the five is an understudy.

"But it's not about Muslims and Jews," says deSilva. "It's all very generic so it can apply to any school, anywhere."

The bright colours and friendly style also make it easier for kids to relate to the puppets' stories and talk about issues such as what it's like to celebrate different religious holidays or have a name that's hard to pronounce.

"It's cool. I liked the puppets," said 10-year-old Hanad Abdi, whose favourite was Nam, the Vietnamese-Canadian puppet with slicked-back hair.

"They like it because it's multicultural," says teacher Robin Waxer, who brought her Grade 4 and 5 class to see the skit. "There are people here who are from Somalia, who are Jamaican, Jewish. We've talked a lot about this."

Teachers are given material to prepare students for the skit and continue the discussion afterwards.

The pilot project is currently funded by Access and Equality Toronto and the National Crime Prevention Strategy. The Concerned Kids has 15 puppet troupes presenting on different social action issues. It costs about $8,000 to outfit each troupe with puppets, costumes and scripts. The organizers hope to take the tolerance skits beyond the Greater Toronto Area if the pilot project is successful.

U of Windsor's vice-president sets new goals

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Neil Gold, who was recently re-appointed to a second six-year term as provost and vice-president of the University of Windsor, has travelled far and wide as an educator.

He has worked in Argentina, Ecuador, Peru, Britain, Zimbabwe, Australia, New Zealand and Singapore, where he was a legal education and justice reform consultant.

And in 1990, he helped establish a new law school at City University in Hong Kong. "We designed an educational program that became a model for other such programs around the Commonwealth," said Gold, a lawyer by training.

At the University of Windsor, Gold is basically the chief academic officer.

"I work with deans and other senior leaders to develop and manage our programs of instruction and our research activities," he explained. "It's my responsibility to oversee the university's core activities: the creation, preservation and dissemination of knowledge."

A former Torontonian who turned 58 on May 16, he was dean of law, dean of continuing education and dean of students before assuming his present position.

In his first term as provost, Gold and his colleagues fostered and promoted objectives ranging from transparency to clarity of purpose.

And now, as he looks ahead, he expressed confidence that the university is heading in the right direction.

"Our enrollment base is firmer than before. We have hired about 300 faculty members and librarians to replace retirees. We now have viable plans for all our areas. We are beginning to innovate in program content and design thanks to our president's strategic blueprint for the next five years.

Gold, whose wife Mary is associate law dean at the university, has definite goals in mind. In an interview last week, he said: "We seek a balance between a strong research culture in which students participate, and a concertedly student-oriented approach to learning and teaching and the provision of services.

"We want to demonstrate that students' learning and personal growth and development are clearly and pervasively central to all our activities and be known as the best place in Canada to learn."

Expounding on his philosophy of education, Gold observed, "I think it's clear that students learn best when they are active participants and are provided ways to see how what they are learning is meaningful and relevant to them. We focus on students and their needs while being clear about the core requirements of our fields of study."

Students should be able to demonstrate abilities in acquiring knowledge and research and in computer skills, he said.

And they should be capable of exercising critical thinking and possess literacy, numeracy, interpersonal and teamwork skills.

Last but not least, they should be motivated by a desire to learn continuously.

Neil Gold

Gold, a graduate of York University, the University of Toronto law faculty and Osgoode Hall Law School, launched his career in 1973 when he started the University of Windsor's law clinic.

Two years later, at the University of Victoria, he helped establish its law school. "We developed some new courses that sought to integrate understanding about obligations, rights and legal processes. And we created a very welcoming and positive learning environment that fostered dialogue and debate."

While in Victoria, he was president of an 1860s-era synagogue that was restored to its former splendour.

In 1981, Gold went to Vancouver to become director of the bar admission and professional legal training programs for the Continuing Legal Education Society of British Columbia.

Then he returned to Victoria for a spell before becoming dean of law at the University of Windsor.

"We developed an outstanding reputation in the profession," said Gold, whose mother Marie was a homemaker and whose father, Marcus, ran a Toronto millinery firm, American Hat Company, and Beverley Hat.

Gold is a believer in the power of the law to achieve justice. But he admits that the legal profession has not always lived up to his standards or expectations.

"I have been disappointed with the way in which some lawyers, the minority by far, use law to harass, abuse others and avoid accountability.

"In my brief time in legal practice, I became discouraged about the 'game' lawyers played to exact unmerited results without regard for human interests that were always in the balance."

And, he added, his own legal education left much to be desired.

"It was unpleasant for me – highly competitive, not collegial and not much focused on the impact of law on individuals and society. I was young enough and clear-sighted enough to think I might change things."

Of course, he did not. But since then, Gold has grappled with the issues that so annoyed him as a younger man.

Today, he is quite content with his lot in life. "A career in the academy provides tremendous opportunities to meet personal goals, serve society and learn for life."

THE BOOK OF JUDGES & THE UNITED NATIONS:
The Judging of Israel with

Dr. Rachael Turkienicz & Professor Ed Morgan
Faculty of Education at York University
Law Professor University of Toronto; incoming president Canadian Jewish Congress

This series will investigate the parallels and lessons that can be drawn between the ancient and the modern worlds. The United Nations begins its life after the Second World War with a healthy vision and process of leadership but starts to decline slowly. In looking closely at some of the pivotal moments in the United Nations' dealings with the State of Israel, we will raise the same questions as were raised of the ancient world. Is there a parallel in watching a healthy and visionary institution begin to decay? Can the ancient story of the Judges serve as a model to inform us and perhaps warn us of what is happening?

Brazilian Jews want to immigrate to Quebec, official says

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL – A significant number of Brazilian Jews want to immigrate to Quebec because of rising concerns about the economic and political situation in their country, says Jaques Perlow, executive director of the Confederacao Israelita do Brasil, an umbrella Jewish organization based in Sao Paulo.

Perlow was in Montreal recently to discuss with Jewish community officials how they might assist Brazilian Jewish immigration.

Perlow said there are about 100 families who are currently interested in coming to Quebec.

Contact has also been made, he said, with the Quebec immigration office in Buenos Aires, Argentina, which opened in the summer of 2003 and has been actively recruiting potential immigrants from Latin America.

The president of the Confederacao, Berel Aizenstein, and Jacques Terpins, president of the Latin American Jewish Congress and a Brazilian, are expected to be in Montreal in June for further talks, Perlow said.

Argentinian Jewry has been the focus of FEDERATION CJA and Jewish Immigrant Aid Services (JIAS) over the past two years. The Montreal community has actively encouraged Argentinian Jews, hard-hit by the economic crisis in their country, to settle in Montreal where the number of Jews has declined by eight per cent over the past decade.

Perlow met with JIAS president David Sela (who speaks Portuguese) and Victor Goldbloom, who heads the joint task force of JIAS and the federation, which is seeking to increase Jewish immigration to Montreal.

Goldbloom said the community would welcome Brazilian Jews, but at this point it has only three serious inquiries on file.

Goldbloom, who visited Brazil last August, said he is surprised by the dire picture Perlow painted of the situation of Brazilian Jews and is trying to obtain more information from international Jewish organizations on just how bad things are.

During the five days he spent in Sao Paulo and Rio de Janeiro, he met with Perlow and three other community officials and attended synagogue services in Rio. He said he did not get a sense that there was a crisis or that there was a great interest among Jews to emigrate to Quebec.

"A small number, about 10 people, met me after services with questions about the possibility of emigrating here," Goldbloom said.

Perlow told The CJN many of the approximately 120,000 Jews in Brazil have experienced a drastic deterioration in their standard of living because of the country's economic problems since the late 1990s.

A change in the political climate has also provoked anxiety, he said. For the first time in its history, Brazil has a leftist government headed by Luiz Incio Lula da Silva, who took office in January 2003. The community sees Lula's government as pro-Palestinian in contrast to that of his predecessor Fernando Henrique Cardoso. "He was openly friendly to Israel. He received an honorary degree from Hebrew University," Perlow said.

Perlow notes that Brazil announced plans this year to open a diplomatic office in the West Bank city of Ramallah. Brazilian newspapers ran photos of a Brazilian official being kissed by Yasser Arafat. He said there has been a rise in anti-Semitism generally.

About half of Brazilian Jews live in the capital, Sao Paulo, with the rest in other parts of the country, he said. They are equally divided between Ashkenazim and Sephardim. Jews trace their first arrival in the region to before the Inquisition, he said, and Brazil claims the oldest synagogue in the Americas, built in 1640 and still preserved in Recife.

The Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks in the United States perked up aliyah, too, he added. Sept. 11 illustrated that the fact of terrorism does not respect national borders. "People don't feel as safe as they used to," said Anavi.

Certainly, the intifadah has not deterred Wolf, who is getting married next month and plans to be a teacher in Israel.

From 1948 to 1994 the source of olim is from the Central Bureau of Statistics.

 From 1995, the source of olim is from the Central Bureau of Statistics and includes Israelis as part of olim families.

"When I'm in Toronto, I'm apprehensive about the situation," said Wolf, a 24-year-old university student and graduate of Eitz Chaim Day School and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. "But over there, in Israel, I feel exactly right."

Nor has Alex Pomson been intimidated by the spectre of terrorism. "It was not a consideration in our plans," said Pomson, who holds the Koschitzky Chair in Jewish education at York University. "Unfortunately, we're familiar with terror incidents. But we appreciate that life goes on."

Tanya, his 38-year-old wife, concurred. "Terrorism is obviously a concern. But we've been in Israel during some of the harder times."

Their refusal to be cowed by the daily drumbeat of violence comes naturally to modern Orthodox Jews such as Wolf and the Pomsons, who comprise about 60 percent of the new olim who have arranged their aliyah through Anavi.

According to Anavi, about 25 percent of new immigrants from Canada are Conservative and Reform Jews, while the rest are secular.

"As a person, I'm happier in Israel," explained Wolf, both of whose European-born parents previously lived there. "I feel like I belong in Israel. I'm part of something, the past and the future. I feel Jewish in Israel. My roots are there."

"My wife and I both grew up in B'nai Akiva (the religious Zionist youth movement) and our families are Orthodox," said Pomson, who was born in Britain 40 years ago. "This is something we always wanted to do. "

"It's an ideal I grew up with," observed Tanya. "It has been my ultimate aim to end up in Israel. We're doing it now because the kids – Anna [13], Ori [11], Ittai [9] and Shifra [7] – are getting older."

According to Anavi, young couples, with or without children, constitute the majority of Israel-bound immigrants. They are likely to be in their early 30s, university-educated, self-employed and possess a knowledge of Hebrew.

In addition, they have probably visited Israel as tourists, students or volunteers and have relatives or friends there.

"This is a good time for them to go to Israel," said Anavi, referring to the quintessentially typical immigrant. "They're young enough to be able to adjust and become part of Israeli society."

With the assistance of a social worker, the Israel Aliyah Center has also begun recruiting young adults in foster homes and on the streets who have drifted away from the Jewish community.

"The goal is to bring them to Israel and help them adjust to life in Israel," said Anavi.

To ensure success in their new environment, prospective immigrants should look for jobs and hunt for housing before leaving Canada. "We give them useful information," said Anavi. "But they should use family connections and go to Israeli web sites on employment agencies, cities, banks and schools."

Like all olim who settle in Israel under the Law of Return, Wolf and the Pomsons are eligible for a basket of fairly generous government benefits aimed at easing their integration.

For three years from the date of their aliyah, they may import personal belongings, appliances and furniture on a duty free basis. On new cars, 50 per cent of the duties are waived, though the 17 percent value-added tax must be paid.

The cost of the El Al flight is absorbed by Israel, and in their first year, individuals and families receive absorption stipends.

Also in the first year, Hebrew ulpan language lessons are free of charge. If an immigrant is not working during the first six months, medical coverage is provided. Should an immigrant choose to reside in an absorption centre, the first six months are free.

The sales tax on a house is reduced for the first 10 years. Rental subsidies are available in the first four years.

As well, immigrants are eligible for income tax reductions in the first three years. Discounts depend on income and size of family.

The state offers free adult education within five years of aliyah, plus a living allowance in some cases.

The ministry of absorption picks up the cost of tuition for university students under 25 studying for a first degree. Olim under 27 who already have earned a degree can apply for a stipend to cover the first two years of tuition toward a post-graduate degree.

And under a North American-funded program known as Nefesh b'Nefesh, an immigrant deemed to have a good chance of making it in Israel can apply for further financial assistance that becomes a grant after the third year.

"There are a lot of minor benefits, too," said Anavi, citing as an example the free Hebrew lessons elementary and high school students may take.

Due to cost-cutting measures, Israel has dropped special mortgage rates and housing grants.

"The benefits are somewhat helpful," said Alex Pomson. "They make a difference in relieving financial pressures. But we would have made aliyah without them."

New olim tend to settle in Tel Aviv, Jerusalem and nearby localities. A few opt for cities such as Eilat or Beersheba, kibbutzim or settlements in the territories.

Wolf intends to live in Ma'alot – a Galilee development town and the scene of a 1974 terrorist attack – with her new husband, David Singer Jordan, a Canadian who made aliyah a decade ago. Both have relatives in Israel.

The Pomsons, with relatives in Israel, too, plan to live in Baka, a neighbourhood in Jerusalem. Alex, the vice-principal of a Jewish school in London prior to his arrival in Toronto in 1996, is currently negotiating for a position at an Israeli university.

The Jewish Agency regards aliyah as a process, explained Anavi.

"We're aware that some olim, having left family and friends behind, may have to return to Canada, even for years. We accept the fact that you can't disconnect yourself from your past life."

He has no idea how many olim give up in frustration and go back to their former homes in Canada.

"I know some have returned, but I don't keep figures. They don't report to my office."

Despite the hardships they may encounter in Israel, new immigrants usually leave Canada with a positive attitude.

As Wolf succinctly put it, "I'm definitely going there with the intention of staying."

Israel should withdraw from Gaza: Krauthammer

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel should withdraw from the Gaza Strip out of self-interest and not as a favour to the Palestinians, U.S. syndicated columnist Charles Krauthammer believes.

"Israel should pull out because Gaza is indefensible militarily," he said in a recent interview. "Israel has to rationalize and straighten out its defensive lines."

Positing further reasons why a unilateral withdrawal is necessary, Krauthammer noted that Israel is at war with the Palestinians and that the current Palestinian leadership is not a credible negotiating partner.

Claiming that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat seeks Israel's destruction, Krauthammer said, "If Arafat didn't want to destroy Israel, he would have made a counter offer at the Camp David summit four years ago."

Asked how he reconciles Arafat's public support for a two-state solution with his own contention that Arafat's real objective is Israel's demise, Krauthammer replied:

"Arafat is a liar. He signed 63 ceasefires during the civil war in Lebanon. What does that tell you about him? Of course he's a liar! Arafat will never sign an agreement that leaves a Jewish state intact."

The present generation of Palestinians is simply not ready for a two-state solution, and may not be for years to come.

"Israel won't get a deal from them even if it withdraws to the 1967 lines. Right now, there is no one on the Palestinian side to give anything to." The Palestinians have yet to produce a moderate leadership, he said.

Suggesting that most Israelis back a withdrawal from Gaza, he declared, "It will happen under one Israeli government or another."

Krauthammer, a conservative columnist associated with the Washington Post Writers Group, urged Prime Minister Ariel Sharon to move ahead with his recently announced plan to evacuate Gaza on a unilateral basis.

"If I were him, I'd go straight ahead."

On May 2, the Likud party's central committee rejected the scheme by a wide margin in a non-binding referendum.

"Sharon can't break a promise to the president of the United States, especially after he went out on a limb for him," said Krauthammer, referring to George W. Bush's statement in mid-April backing Israel's right to retain parts of the West Bank and refusal to accept an influx of Palestinian refugees.

Sharon runs the risk of alienating Israeli public opinion and rupturing relations with the United States should he reconsider his plan, he warned.

"Any policy that lacks the support of Israeli public opinion and the United States is dead," he added.

"Gaza will never be part of Israel."

Krauthammer expressed sympathy for Gaza's 7,500 Jewish settlers who vehemently oppose Sharon's proposal. "People don't want to be uprooted from their homes. That's pretty understandable. But in the end, the people as a whole decide what's in a nation's interests."

He acknowledged he was at a loss to explain how Sharon would persuade the settlers to pack their bags and leave. "It may cost him the prime ministership."

Krauthammer was scathing in describing Sharon's decision to call a Likud party referendum to settle the issue.

"It was one of the stupidest political moves. He thought he would win. But you never ask a question to which you don't already have an answer or are not sure of the outcome. If he had called a national referendum, it would have been a slam dunk. He made a fine mess of it."

In his view, a withdrawal will not be interpreted as a Palestinian victory since Israel is building an electronic security fence through the West Bank.

The barrier will stop terrorism, deprive the Palestinians of a powerful weapon and define the borders of Israel and a future Palestinian state.

"It's a demographic fence," he noted, saying that about 70 per cent of Jewish settlers in the West Bank will end up living on the Israeli side.

Claiming that Sharon intends to retain upwards of 15 per cent of the West Bank, Krauthammer said that Israel will have no problem defending such areas.

"Israel shouldn't stay in Nablus or Ramallah, but should keep places like Ma'aleh Adumim and Gush Etzion," he said in a reference to Israel's biggest West Bank settlement and a cluster of settlements near Jerusalem.

Krauthammer denounced proposals by Israeli personalities Ami Ayalon and Yossi Beilin for a virtual Israeli withdrawal to the 1967 borders.

"They're beyond naive," he asserted. "They're criminally naive. The problem in the Middle East is the lack of a Palestinian partner. Jews will negotiate among themselves until they're blue in the face, and in the finest talmudic tradition."

Krauthammer does not rule out the possibility that the Bush administration will lean on Israel for political concessions on the Palestinian track to win the support of the Arab world for its policy in Iraq. "It's possible. Maybe rhetorical pressure, but not much more."

The road map to peace will remain still-born unless the Palestinians dismantle "the terror apparatus," he said.

Krauthammer has no regrets about the United States' invasion of Iraq. "History will judge. But Saddam Hussein is gone, the Baath regime never to return, and his two sons are dead. Libya, as a direct result, has disarmed."

And now, Iraq stands a decent chance of becoming a country that will neither terrorize its population nor its neighbours. "That's a pretty impressive list of achievements."

The Abu Ghraib prison abuse scandal has temporarily damaged U.S. interests in Iraq, but "people who think Abu Ghraib is a turning point know little about history," he stated.

Calling the new anti-Semitism in Europe "extremely serious," he said, "It's a return to the pre-Holocaust norm. The last 50 years were an aberration. Now we're back to old Europe. The Europeans are not too comfortable with the idea of the proud, independent Jew. They swallowed this discomfort for 50 years in the shadow and shame of the Holocaust. Now they have no shame. So they do what they can to cut Jews down to size."

Apart from Britain and Denmark, Jews have no business living in Europe anymore, said Krauthammer.

By contrast, the new anti-Semitism has bypassed the United States because of its spirit of decency and tolerance. "That makes us unique."

Krauthammer, who practised psychiatry before journalism, was in Toronto to address Canadian Friends of Ben-Gurion University.

Conference draws over 120 women from across Canada

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — More than 120 women from across the country gathered here recently to network, learn from one another, and enhance their leadership skills.

Many Voices One Vision: Canadian Jewish Women Speak, a three-day conference sponsored by UIA Federations of Canada, featured a wide array of speakers from Canada and Israel, as well as workshops and panel discussions.

At a luncheon held on Parliament Hill, best-selling author Irshad Manji, who has just received the first annual Oprah Winfrey Chutzpah Award, described her life as a Muslim woman who dares to question her own religion.

As a young child growing up in Vancouver, in a family that had been refugees from Idi Amin's Uganda, Manji attended weekend classes in Islam where she recalls being taught that women are inferior and Jews are evil. Even at the age of eight she questioned both premises, a bold move that heralded the beginning of a lifetime of questioning.

"Where is the evidence for the so-called Jewish conspiracy against Islam?" she asked.

The ability to question her religion seems to have been lost, she said, although "in the early decades of Islam, 135 schools of Muslim thought existed."

Unwilling to blindly accept what the imams told her, she has spent years in study and in a personal quest for meaning without abandoning Islam.

Manji challenged Canadian women, "who have the luxury of freedom of speech and thought, to join me in expecting more of Islam. Join me in asking more of Muslims."

The keynote speaker at the conference, Justice Rosalie Silberman Abella, discussed the differences between human rights and civil liberties. By sharing her own family's personal story of loss and escape from the Holocaust, she emphasized that human tragedies abound in the world today.

"We have made remarkable progress and we are immeasurably ahead of where we were 50 years ago in many ways, but we have not learned the most important lesson – how to prevent the abuses.

"Instead of lamenting past injustices, we must learn to stop them before they occur. Where injustice is preventable, it should be prevented when it is first identified," she said.

Other speakers at the conference included Marlene Catterall, MP for Ottawa West; and Ruth Bar-On, executive director of SELAH – The Israel Crisis Management Center.

Israeli-Canadian military ties said strong

OTTAWA – If the recent one-day conference held in Ottawa by the Canadian Defence Industries Association is any indication, military co-operation between Canada and Israel is strong and getting stronger.

Speaking to more than 100 participants from the Canadian government, Israeli government and private defence companies from both countries, Ambassador Haim Divon explained why Israel is so advanced in the field.

"For us, it is a necessity, not an option. We don't want to be featured on the history channel," he said. "This is an event of mutual interest and for the benefit of both countries."

Israeli companies hoping to do business in Canada were here to take advantage of opportunities in the country. They learned about Canada's rules and regulations, its procurement policies and tips on how to trade successfully.

Toronto MP Art Eggleton, chair of the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group, described the time leading up to the signing of the free-trade agreement between Canada and Israel in 1996, the first free-trade agreement outside North America, when he was Canada's minister of international trade.

"Both Canada and Israel are trading countries, countries whose economies greatly depend on trade. Recognizing that and recognizing globalization, I set out to expand our horizons in terms of free trade," Eggleton said.

"Defence procurement is a slow process…it takes a lot of patience. There needs to be persistence, there needs to be a greater presence on your part. It is not enough to try to manage it from the United States. There is a similarity, but there are differences as well between the United States and Canada," he said.

"You have my support and the support of the Parliamentary Friendship Group, which is made up of parliamentarians of all parties as we try to strengthen that relationship and friendship between Canada and Israel and I hope and pray that Israel will find peace within secure borders very soon," said Eggleton.

Alan Williams, assistant deputy minister in the Department of National Defence, echoed Eggleton's advice to Israeli companies, adding, "[Y]ou also need to ensure that you and your interests are properly represented here on the ground – to optimize your chances of success, you need to be present, seen and become known."

Williams said Canada can also benefit greatly from increased trade.

"The fact is that there are no, let me repeat, no policy or other structural impediments to DND's ability to acquire Israeli defence products. The policy may have been somewhat less clear 15 or so years ago, but as I speak to this audience, there is no reason why DND cannot purchase Israeli defence goods if they offer the most in terms of competitiveness and performance," he said. – D.K.

'Ambassadors of peace' honoured for their work

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Israeli ambassador to Canada Haim Divon and his daughter Michelle were recently honoured as "ambassadors of peace" by the Ottawa branch of State of Israel Bonds.

The duo were feted for their efforts to bridge the cultural divide between Israel and its neighbours. The event, which was held at Beth Shalom Synagogue, was attended by several members of Parliament, Senator Laurier Lapierre, Government House Leader Jacques Saada, the Hon. Justice Morris Fish, former Liberal MP Herb Gray and former NDP leader and MP Alexa McDonough.

Peter Herndorff, president and CEO of the National Arts Centre (NAC), spoke of his close friendship with the Divon family, developed during their four years in the nation's capital.

"Eveyone in this room knows that Haim has a reputation as the most energetic ambassador in Ottawa," he said, "but even by that standard, Haim and Linda's [Divon's wife] presence at the NAC has been amazing."

After reading a message from Pinchas Zukerman, director of the NAC Orchestra, Herndorff presented Divon with a Zukerman-autographed baton "to orchestrate peace throughout the Middle East."

Michelle, who is about to graduate from high school, said in a speech, "Spending four years in Canada enabled me to learn multiculturalism and to respect every person, regardless of background. People in Canada take it for granted that they can talk to anyone, regardless of religion, nationality or race, but it is different in Israel."

Michelle is organizing a summer camp on the grounds of her school, Ashbury College, for Israeli and Palestinian youth to get to know each other far away from the scene of the conflict. She hopes this will be a first step in preparing the next generation for a real and lasting peace.

"My work reflects the upbringing my parents have provided me and therefore most of the credit goes to them," she said.

Senator Mobina Jaffer spoke of her relationship with Divon and of her experiences in Israel, beginning with her visit as a special envoy to a conference in Haifa. Arriving shortly after a suicide bombing there, she said she was moved by her experiences. Before she had left Canada, she expressed some hesitation about the trip, but her daughter encouraged her to go.

"You are the chair of a committee of women, peace and security; how can you say no? It is always easy to talk about peace from a place of peace, but you have to experience conflict to understand it," she said.

"When Haim and I met, I knew that Allah had given me a job to do," said Jaffer. "Together we have to find a solution; to stop the violence, to bring two communities together. Canada must play a larger role in bringing a sustainable peace to the Middle East."

FROM MIRACLE TO MIRACLE: The students of United Synagogue Day Schools, Bathurst campus, recently raised $2,000 for Israel Research Cancer Fund (IRCF). The money raised goes to support scientists in Israel working on cancer research. Seen from left are Jamie Rose, Hilary Notkin, Taia Samuel, Jacqueline Jordan, Jamie Blustein, and top, Mindy Blustein.

Coast to Coast

Three new leaders will take their case to the people have frequently and forcefully spoken out for Israel and against anti-Semitism, but their boss has been less vocal on the issues.

Which leaves Martin. The prime minister was said to be visibly shaken at the recent spate of anti-Semitic attacks in Ontario and Quebec, culminating in the firebombing of United Talmud Torahs in Montreal on April 5. His strongly-worded reaction to the UTT attack – "This is not my Canada. This is not our Canada" – was repeated in headlines across the country.

Martin "shows a real understanding of what we have to come to call 'the new anti-Semitism' – the demonization and delegitimization of Israel," says Canadian Jewish Congress president Keith Landy, who has held talks with Martin several times, both as prime minister and finance minister.

"We believe he's a true friend of the community," said Landy. Should Martin be re-elected, "we have great expectations of change with respect to Israel. He's a strong advocate of a strong Israel with defensible borders, and he equally wants the peace process to go forward. And I think he realizes there's very little on the Palestinian side to negotiate with."

And while Harper "has much to learn" about foreign affairs, the Conservatives' policy on Israel has been "sterling," Landy said. "Israel can only benefit from these two parties."

Martin had much to say about the Mideast peace process when he sought the Liberal leadership in 1990. In a CJN interview at the time, he voiced support for then-Israeli Labor Party leader Shimon Peres' "land-for-peace" formula.

"I believe that land for peace is the ultimate solution [to the Arab-Israeli conflict]," Martin said, but cautioning that "as Canadians, it's not up to us to pre-judge the outcome of negotiations, but to encourage them."

A devout Roman Catholic who attends church regularly wherever he is, Martin spoke out against racism and anti-Semitism well before the most recent anti-Jewish incidents. He attended the inauguration a year ago of the Montreal Holocaust Museum, and condemned last autumn's anti-Semitic tirade by Mahathir Mohammed, Malaysia's retiring prime minister.

In an Internet journal, or blog, he described the remarks as "hateful, hurtful and deeply offensive," adding it was important to speak out against this kind of outburst "if for no other reason than to make clear that from Canada's perspective, this is unacceptable. It is hatemongering and it should be called as such without equivocation."

He also blasted Mahathir for long having used language "that can be barely described as code with respect to Jews."

The general issue of religion has already reared its head in this campaign, even before a vote has been called. It began with the announcement earlier this spring that three high-profile religious activists, all evangelical Christians, would seek candidacies for the Conservatives.

> No matter which party wins the election, the current face of the House of Commons will change

Last month, a furor erupted when it was discovered that a poll commissioned by the Liberals asked some voters whether they would be "more or less likely to vote for the Conservatives if you knew they had been taken over by evangelical Christians."

Some of Martin's own MPs lashed out, saying that as devout Christians, they were offended. But Liberal party officials defended the poll as an appropriate way to gauge Canadians' feelings on socially conservative issues.

Last month, Martin was agitated in the Commons when he angrily lashed out at the "prejudice" and "bigotry" of Conservatives. It came in response to a Tory MP who accused the Liberals of preparing to attack members of his party because of their religious faith.

Shouting over a howling House of Commons, Martin called the question "as vile as it possibly could be," and added: "Let me say that faith, religion has no room in politics. The fact is that this government would never allow that."

Still, issues with strong religious overlays are bound to come up in the election: Same-sex marriage is sure to be a flashpoint, and many Christians are eager to punish the Liberals for passing Bill C-250, which added sexual orientation to the Criminal Code's hate crimes provisions. Devout Christians have expressed fear the bill could be used to gag faith-based teachings about homosexuality and even ban the Bible as hate propaganda.

But are Jews eager to punish the Liberals for their voting record in the UN and their stance on Israel?

It doesn't seem likely. After all, Jean Chrétien was handily re-elected in 2000 just as his government was being excoriated for supporting a United Nations resolution that condemned Israel for excessive force against Palestinians.

No matter which party wins the election, the current face of the House of Commons will change. Two Liberal stalwarts, Art Eggleton in York Centre and Elinor Caplan in Thornhill, won't be on the ballots.

Eggleton, a longtime friend and outspoken advocate of the Jewish community, will make way for Toronto Maple Leafs president Ken Dryden, while in Thornhill, Canada's riding with the most Jews, Vaughan city councillor Susan Kadis will be the Liberal hopeful.

In the coming weeks, The CJN will keep an eye on the following ridings:

• Brossard-La Prairie in Quebec, where Jacques Saada, leader of the government in the House and one of five Jewish MPs, may not be a shoo-in. He won the riding in 2000 with 52 per cent of the vote, but the Bloc Québécois could mount a serious challenge this time.

• Eglinton-Lawrence in Toronto, where Joe Volpe, minister of human resources and skills development, is popular with Jewish voters. However, many Orthodox residents in the Bathurst-Lawrence area became signed-up members of the Alliance in 2000, and may be drawn to Conservative candidate Bernie Tanz.

• Laval-Les Iles in suburban Montreal, considered safe for Jewish MP Raymonde Folco. She won last time with 53 per cent of votes cast.

• In Mount Royal, considered the safest Liberal seat in the country, justice minister Irwin Cotler faces little opposition. In 2000, Cotler took the seat once held by Pierre Trudeau with 81 per cent of the vote.

• In the Toronto riding of St. Paul's, Carolyn Bennett, who chairs the Canada-Israel Parliamentary Friendship Group, will face Conservative Barry Cline. The riding is not expected to slip from Liberal hands.

• Kadis in Thornhill may get a stiff challenge from Conservative Josh Cooper, a former Alliance member who has been campaigning in the riding for months. Cooper has called on Kadis to resign her municipal seat while she campaigns.

• Toronto's Willowdale riding is currently held by Liberal Jim Peterson, also a strong friend of Israel. He's expected to coast to another win.

• In Winnipeg South Centre, Jewish Liberal MP Anita Neville is expected to win re-election.

• And in York Centre, Toronto city councillor Howard Moscoe last week squelched rumours that he would seek the NDP candidacy, leaving the seat open for the taking by star candidate Dryden, the former Montreal Canadiens legend.

IDF redeploys in Rafah, says scaling down Gaza operation

By ARNON REGULAR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The IDF's Operation Rainbow, aimed at flushing out militants and arms smugglers in the Rafah refugee camp, will continue, military sources said last week, after troops and tanks pulled out of part of the southern Gaza refugee camp.

Israel said the Israel Defence Forces had withdrawn most of its forces from Rafah's Tel Sultan neighbourhood, the focus of the operation, and that troops were deployed along its perimetre. But army officials emphasized that Operation Rainbow was far from over.

The commander of the IDF troops in Gaza, Brigadier General Shmuel Zakai, said in a press briefing that Operation Rainbow would not end in the coming days, and that the army had received no order to leave Rafah. He added that the nature of the operation demanded that the IDF reduce its troop presence in the camp in order to allow the local population to obtain food and medicine, and to ensure maximum flexibility for the operation.

Army Radio quoted senior military sources as saying that the Palestinians "can't breathe easy yet."

Palestinian witnesses said that most of the troops have also left the As-Salam section and the Brazil section next to the border, Israel Radio reported. A tank and a bulldozer were blocking the entrance to Tel Sultan, and the IDF has dispersed pamphlets in the neighbourhood asking residents to prevent terrorists from operating in the region, according to the report.

Earlier, hundreds of Tel Sultan residents rushed into the streets to inspect the damage caused during the Israeli operation, but Israeli forces opened fire and leaders urged people to remain indoors, a local doctor said.

Municipal officials said at least 43 homes were demolished and dozens more damaged in the camp since the offensive began. The IDF said it deliberately demolished seven homes, including one belonging to an Islamic Jihad militant. Other damage to homes and roads was caused by heavy military vehicles and Palestinian militant roadside bombs, the army said.

Forty Palestinians have been killed in the operation. Most were armed, said the IDF.

Political sources in Jerusalem, meanwhile, told Israel Radio that the operation would be scaled down, and that troops had left areas where their missions had been completed.

Minister Gideon Ezra said that the army would reduce its presence in the camp, and would concentrate on intelligence gathering. Ezra said IDF troops would block arms-smuggling tunnels in Rafah based on intelligence information gleaned from questioning Palestinians who know the tunnels' whereabouts, rather than by knocking down houses to find out whether or not a tunnel was hidden underneath.

Last Thusday, nine Palestinians – including eight militants – were killed by the IDF as troops moved into two new neighbourhoods in Rafah, witnesses and military sources said. In addition, the body of Hamas' military wing commander in Rafah was located last Thursday evening; the circumstances of his death are unclear.

In the West Bank, two Palestinians, including the local Hamas leader in Qalqilyah and a 13-year-old boy, were killed by IDF fire that day. An IDF soldier suffered critical wounds in a pre-dawn friendly fire incident in Jenin. In addition, Palestinian militants fired six Qassam rockets toward Israel last Thursday and one on Friday, but there were no injuries.

***

Israel's security operation against the terror strongholds last week and the accompanying loss of innocent life in Gaza elicited public expressions of sadness from the Canada-Israel Committee.

"We extend sincere condolences to the families of those who suffered casualties and look forward to the results of the Israeli government investigation into today's incident", said CIC Chair, Marc Gold.

"The continuing loss of innocent life on both sides underscores the urgent need for the emergence of a credible Palestinian leadership to join with Israel in seeking a peaceful resolution to the violence and conflict based on the 'Roadmap' blueprint ," concluded Gold.

Let's not get mired in Gaza

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Opinion

The incident last Wednesday in Rafah, in which an Israeli tank may have been responsible for the deaths of seven Palestinians, is another reminder that the Gaza Strip is a quagmire. The strategic directive that must not be forgotten is: make sure not to get mired in Gaza.

The operational needs in the Gaza Strip are deceptively tempting. There will always be a reason to penetrate further into Gaza to achieve a more important operational target. And suddenly we find ourselves in the quagmire. These are not huge geographic areas, desert steppes or deep snow. The quagmire in the Strip are the 1.4 million Palestinians living in refugee camps, in terribly crowded conditions.

This number will increase quickly in view of the young population there. In about a decade, demographers say, the population will reach about three million. Palestinian leaders say that when they take over, there will be no way to avoid transferring population to the West Bank.

There is very little chance of finding a reasonable solution to the problem of the Gaza Strip. Israel must distance itself from the quagmire at any price.

Israel must also help from the outside, because poverty and despair are a hothouse for nurturing terrorism. Were the Palestinians to declare a unilateral ceasefire in the Gaza Strip right now, Israel would be dragged in there, and a different process would begin.

Israel occupied the Gaza Strip twice in the past, and then withdrew – once in 1956 and once in 1967. During the term of the previous government when Labor was part of the coalition, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who was then foreign minister, often urged taking control of the Gaza Strip, including Gaza City. Sharon was supported at that time by the chief of staff, Shaul Mofaz, and only the opposition of the Labor party's defence minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer prevented it.

Now Israel is inside Gaza once again.

The condemnations of the world are received with indifference by the government, and the indifference is reinforced by the fact that similar, and worse, blunders are happening to the Americans in Iraq. There is also an intention to prove to the Palestinians that Israel will not be deterred from completing its military goals against the instigators of terrorism.

The operation in the Rafah area has not yet ended and we cannot yet measure its success. To do that, we must take into account the goals established at the outset. One goal was to seize large caches of weapons in Rafah, which the Palestinians have managed to smuggle via new tunnels beneath the Philadelphi route. That has not happened yet. Another goal was to seize the contractors, the experts and the engineers who dig the tunnels. Their names are known to the IDF, but most of them succeeded in escaping. Only one big fish was reeled in. These are meagre achievements.

There was another major objective as well, which has not been discussed in public, but hovers above all.

The objective was developed after three serious incidents: first the murder of Tali Hatuel and her four daughters, who were shot at point-blank range. This was followed by the explosion of two armoured personnel carriers. There was great rejoicing in the Gaza Strip, and arms warehouses were opened to continue the attacks. At that point, the Israel Defence Forces decided that we must restore Israel's deterrence capability, because if we don't, the escalation in the violence directed against Jews will continue.

Has this goal been accomplished? It is difficult to measure, but we can assume that the answer is positive to a great extent. Still, along with increased deterrence, there is also an increase in hatred and the desire to take revenge among Palestinians, and in the world's unbridled criticism.

Israel's economy grows

The economy grew by 5.5 per cent in the first quarter of 2004 compared to the same period last year, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics' preliminary estimates. The annualized growth figure is higher than the most optimistic forecasts made by all economic forecasters.

Changes to electoral vote

The Knesset gave final approval to a proposal to raise the electoral threshold in the next Knesset elections to 2 per cent from 1.5 per cent. Only parties that win at least 66,000 votes would be able to enter the 17th Knesset. Votes cast for factions that received less than 66,000 votes would be lost and not included in the calculation dividing the 120 Knesset seats among the parties.

Barghouti found guilty

An Israeli court convicted Marwan Barghouti, a Palestinian official, of murder. Last week's verdict at Tel Aviv District Court found Barghouti guilty in connection with three shooting ambushes by the Al-Aqsa Brigade in which five people were killed, as well as a botched suicide bombing. But the Fatah leader was acquitted on 21 other counts of murder for lack of evidence. Sentencing is set for June 6. Palestinian groups threatened to kidnap Israelis to use as bargaining chips to win Barghouti's freedom.

Breach in the Wall?

The eastern wall of the Temple Mount is "in immediate danger of collapse," the director of the Antiquities Authority, Yehoshua Dorfman, told the Knesset's interior committee. If this happens, it will have a domino effect that will lead to the collapse of a considerable part of the compound, he warned. A recent earthquake has caused a movement of 2.5 cm in the eastern wall and the widening of an existing protrusion in the eastern wall.

Kidnap attempt against NY Times newsman

Palestinians tried to kidnap New York Times correspondent James Bennet, the Times' bureau chief for Israel last week. Bennet said he was speaking on a cellphone in front of a hospital in the Gaza Strip refugee camp of Rafah when a Palestinian came up to him, said hello and offered his hand. When Bennet shook his hand, the man and another Palestinian grabbed Bennet and tried to throw him into a car. A kidnapping was averted only by Palestinian police. The two men fled.

End to Ron Arad saga?

Ron Arad, the Israel Air Force navigator who went missing in Lebanon in 1986, reportedly is dead. Quoting diplomatic sources knowledgeable about efforts to determine Arad's whereabouts, Reuters reported last week that the airman is dead and that Hezbollah has his body. Israeli officials said they were checking the report. Files from JTA and Ha'aretz.

Egyptian school texts defame Israel and Jews

The American Jewish Committee, founded in 1906 and headquartered in New York City, seeks to protect the rights of Jews around the world and combats bigotry and anti-Semitism.

The data in the report is based on a study of 103 Egyptian textbooks used in primary, preparatory and secondary state schools and 16 textbooks found in preparatory and secondary religious schools.

According to the 172-page report, Israel is depicted as a usurper of Palestinian land and as an aggressor that inflicts pain and suffering on the Palestinians.

Israel's name hardly ever appears on maps. On many maps, Palestine appears instead.

In a grade 8 book, Islamic Notions in Environmental and Demographic Education, Israel is referred to only obliquely: "The poet asks: How is it possible for an oppressor and aggressor to walk on the tender soil of the east? How does the aggressor fulfill his wishes on the pure soil of the east, while its own sons live there as strangers?"

A grade 11 lesson in History for Public High School describes the 1967 Six Day War as an example of Israeli perfidy: "For the third time, the goals of Zionism coincided with [those of] imperialism. Zionist expansionist schemes are expressed by the phrase 'from the Nile to the Euphrates.'"

The text adds that Israel lured the Arab states into a war for which they were not prepared.

In a poem in History for Public High School, Israel's sincerity regarding peace is doubted: "We have already had experience of these people before/And experienced enmity and feud/We have already tasted their treachery before/And therefore we shall not be satisfied with sweet words."

The same text implies that Jews have no place in Israel: "Palestine is Arab. This is the historical reality, a reality Zionism, with the co-operation of the great powers, has tried to completely eradicate, in order to say that Israel is a historical reality."

Jerusalem receives special attention in a grade 6 text, Our Beautiful Language: Grammar and Grammatical Exercises: "Today Jerusalem's wounds bleed, her sigh resounds and her call for help fills the horizons. History shall not forgive the Arabs and the Muslims if they fail to save and liberate Jerusalem."

The Western Wall in Jerusalem, however, is recognized as a Jewish holy place.

Palestinian terrorism is legitimized in the grade 7 text The Struggle of the People of Egypt: "The [guerrillas] started infiltrating into Israel day and night, hitting the settlements, destroying roads, planting road mines, destroying power plants and water [pumping] stations, until fear, worry and confusion became widespread in Israel and its people lived in the trenches day and night. There were no more safe borders for them, as they had been claiming."

Jihad, in a grade 11 text entitled Selections for the Explanation of (the Book of) Selection, is glorified: "Jihad is a religious duty of every individual at a time of general call to arms, and a religious duty of a sufficient number [of Muslims] in other times. Jihad is a firm religious duty and any [Muslim] who repudiates it should be considered an unbeliever."

Martyrdom is lauded in Arabic Language: Read and Express, a grade 5 text: "God loves the strong believer who carries his weapon defending his religion, family, himself and his property. He promises them [that he will enter] Paradise, if the enemies overcome him and [if] he is killed as a martyr."

In the texts under review, Jews, with the exception of biblical figures and Albert Einstein, are seen negatively.

Islamic Education, a grade 11 text, contains a chapter on the Prophet Mohammed's attitude to Jews:

"… they were harbouring in their souls many things … Greed, malice and hatred filled their souls when they saw that Islam's standing in Medina was becoming firmly established…"

Islamic Religious Education, a grade 4 text, claims: "The Jews do not show regard for the neighbour's rights and do not honour treaties."

In general, Egyptian texts do not attack Jews of modern times, except in the context of the Arab-Israeli dispute. But Islamic school books, which take a harder line toward Jews and Israel, have no such scruples.

In "Lessons Derived from the Treatment of the Jews by the Prophet," the grade 11 text, Islamic Education, says, "Religious racism dominates them. They are hostile to the Islamic religion and take a hostile position against any religion that is not theirs."

The book adds:

"Ethnic racism is firmly established in their souls. They hate other ethnic groups and peoples."

"They do not owe allegiance to the home and where they live, nor (do they) keep a commitment. Rather, their life is based on treachery and betrayal."

"The Jews of the past are the [same as the] Jews of today and of the future. [They are] all the same. One should study them, study their ambitions, and arm oneself against them with every [possible] weapon."

Although Judaism and Christianity are respected as monotheistic faiths, Islam is seen as the sole true religion.

"God's religion is one," states a grade 7 text, Islamic Religious Education. "It is Islam… God will not accept from His creatures a religion other than Islam."

In a commentary at the end of his report, Groiss writes, "Textbooks and curricula are a crucial factor if notions of peace are to take root among the younger generation in Egypt."

The report can be read in full on the web site of the Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace: www.edume.org.

Google opens the door to Jewish history of Harbin, China

By JON CAMPBELL
Special to The CJN

HARBIN, China — Ask a Chinese person about the town of Harbin and they'll probably know a thing or two: that it is bitterly cold and that it used to have a sizable Russian population. That's all I knew before I made the overnight train trek northeast from Beijing in search of a few stories about Russia, some hearty food – including, likely, some vodka – and a bit of snowboarding at the nearby resort of Yabuli.

But thanks to the wonders of technology, I stumbled upon Harbin's Jewish history, something I'd neglected to consider, despite knowing full well the extent of the Russian presence in Harbin at the turn of the 20th century.

My journey to Harbin's Jewish community began in a gritty neighbourhood Internet café the night before I was to depart Harbin. I sat among more than 30 gamers of college age, mumbling curses at themselves and their opponents and teammates across the tiny room – and cyberspace. I had come to find out more about the beer Harbiners drank: I noticed that the local brew, Harbin Beer, touted itself as "China's Oldest Brewery," and sensing a story, I had set up a private tour of the 103-year-old brewery. But before I went on the tour the next afternoon, I figured I should do some research.

A Google search for Harbin beer brought me face to face with Harbin's Jewish history. The 10th hit was an article from the China Daily, China's official English newspaper. The article was written to commemorate the release of a coffee table book issued by the Harbin Jewish Research Centre of the Heilongjiang Academy of Social Sciences. I was aghast. The Harbin Jewish Research Centre?

I decided to track down the centre and its director, Li Shuxiao, possibly forsaking my brewery trip if need be. After almost four years of nail-biting, wondering just how much longer her crazed son would be spending in China, my mother, if nobody else, would understand. I was on the phone with Professor Li first thing the next morning and was in his office soon thereafter.

"So few people have heard of Harbin," he said. "But it was China's first international city, the first place that China met the rest of the world."

Li has spent his academic career researching Harbin's international population, specifically Russians, making three trips to Israel to continue – and promote – his research.

The Russian population grew out of the construction of a Vladivostock-Dalian railroad that passed through what was, in 1896, a collection of fishing villages. Within a few years, Harbin was known as "Little Moscow" and before the Japanese invaded China in 1932, it hosted residents hailing from 30 countries.

While Shanghai might be best known for its European Jewish history, and Kaifeng famous for a Jewish population that followed the Silk Road more than a thousand years ago, Harbin's Jewish history has not been well-publicized. But, with Li and others on the case, that is set to change.

"At its peak, there were 20,000 Jews out of a Russian population of 200,000," Li said.

It wasn't the numbers of Jews, but rather, their prominence in Harbin life that led Li to focus his work on his city's Jewish population.

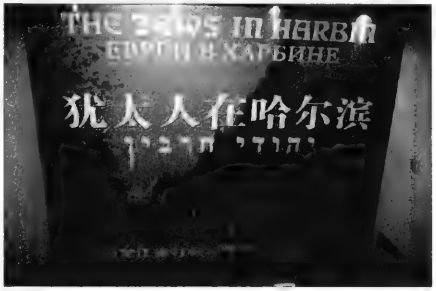
"You can't research Harbin's foreign population without looking into the Jewish population," he said. "Even though they were a minority of the community, they comprised the bulk of its influential members."

Thanks to Li, there is more than decaying and restored architecture – not to mention the best-preserved Jewish cemetery in the Far East – commemorating the former Jewish presence in Harbin: the Jewish Research Centre opened in 2000, and it has an impressive exhibition of photographic displays of the history of the city's Jewry, currently housed in a vacant room in the Academy of Social Sciences, a building not far from the centre's cramped quarters.

Li hopes to move the collection into a former synagogue that he's hoping to renovate into a permanent museum should funding become available. The funding, says Li, should come from a combination of donations and government coffers. Local and provincial governments are both in favour of the move, he says, but there is bickering over who should foot the bill: the centre is in a provincial institution and the synagogue is a city building.

Li's mission of publicizing Harbin's history will be boosted should the synagogue move happen, but the coffee table book, based on the centre's collection, is helping as well – despite his protests that it isn't of a high-enough quality for mass distribution. Currently, aside from the several dozens Li has given away, the book has only been distributed in China, and he hopes it will go through another round of editing before being distributed internationally.

The book features photographs and stories of the community whose progeny have since scattered throughout the world, having left, like most other foreigners, when the Japanese took over the area in the early 1930s. These descendents include internationally renowned politicians and artists.



A poster outside the exhibit of the Jewish Research Centre

"Had it not been for the Japanese invasion, many would have stayed longer. They had established homes there," Li said.

The Olmerts are one of the families of which Li speaks. Ehud Olmert is the former mayor of Jerusalem and currently Israel's deputy prime minister. His brother, Amram, is posted at the Israeli embassy in Beijing.

"My grandfather came to Harbin in 1917," Amram Olmert said. "It was, in a way, the most convenient place to go. And one of the first things I did when I came to China was visit Harbin."

Olmert's father, Mordechai, trained in electronics at Harbin's Technical University and left China against his grandfather's wishes for British Mandate Palestine in 1931, stopping in Holland en route to study agriculture. He eventually rose to a prominent position in the Knesset's agricultural department. Olmert himself has carried on his father's tradition: he is science and agriculture minister at the embassy.

The Olmerts spread throughout the world in the 1930s: to Shanghai and Tianjin, to Russia and to Israel. On his first trip to Harbin, Amram found his grandfather's grave, and cleaned it up. In total, four Olmerts are buried in China: "I like to tell Chinese people that I'm a true capitalist," he said. "'I've got bits of property all over the country,' I tell them. 'A plot in Tianjin, one in Shanghai and a couple in Harbin."

Olmert sees his posting in China as completing the cycle of his family's story.

"I'm coming back to the place from where my parents began their life," he said. "They brought the skills they learned here to Israel. Now I'm bringing Israeli technology and know-how back to China."

His department has been busy lately, with several dozen ongoing projects, and Olmert is about to make his 20th trip to the northwestern province of Xinjiang, where yet another massive project is about to begin.

Meanwhile, other Jews are focusing their gaze on Harbin. Tour East, a Canadian-Chinese travel agency, has been offering Jewish trips to China for the past four years.

"When Jews come to China," said Wang Jianguo, who runs the Chinese end of the tour operator, "they want to know more than your average tourists. We take them to all of the regular sites, but add sites with Jewish history."

Tour East adds visits to Kaifeng, a synagogue off-limits to non-researchers in Shanghai and to a former synagogue-turned restaurant in Tianjin. In October of this year, for the first time, they will be visiting Harbin, with Li's help.

According to Li, most Harbin-based foreigners lived lives as far removed from those of the locals as was possible.

"Most people only knew how to say 'Hello' and 'We're from the same hometown' in Chinese," he said. The Olmerts were different.

"When my parents didn't want us to know what they were saying," said Olmert. "They would speak Mandarin."

"When my father was dying," Olmert recalled, "he spoke Chinese for a whole day. I think he was at the point where he was returning to the happier times in his life."

Summer Fashion

Look, feel and smell great with Estée Lauder.

BEAUTY SHOP

By CAROL WISE

NEWS, NEWS, NEWS

MAKEUP: Pink, pink and more pink say summer in the city. For extra savvy, highlight your eyes with green or turquoise and always rim them with black. Feminine is the key this summer, with eyes and lips glistening in a rather transparent way. Bronze your skin with some really great self-tanners. Just to name a few of the best: Estee Lauder, Clinique and Shisedo.

Dr. Steve Mulholland tells us that 2004 and 2005 will witness the re-emergence of the body in esthetic, non-surgical treatments. With the development of exciting new technologies and procedures that non-surgically enhance and improve the appearance of cellulite and unwanted body fat, there will be an unstoppable wave of excitement in non-surgical fat contouring and cellulite improvement.

Mulholland, a world-recognized cosmetic plastic surgeon, owns and operates Toronto's Spa Medica. He is the creator of three incredible non-surgical facial enhancements, the FotoFacial RF, Pan G and Threadlift. His most current development is pioneering a protocol for non-surgical body contouring that replicates many of the effects of liposuction and simultaneously corrects and improves cellulite.

This exciting program involves the combination of a device called Vela Smooth (developed by the Israeli company Syneron), Mesotherapy and Carboxytherapy. The 12-week, co-ordinated program involves twice weekly visits and monthly maintenance treatments to maintain the cellulite improvement. Mulholland is seeing 50 to 90 per cent improvement in cellulite over the 12 weeks, noticeable lessening of saddle bags, pot bellies and love handles – without a diet regime. It will be available early this summer.

HAIR: Jie Matar of the famous Salon Jie (38 Avenue Rd., Toronto) tells us that hair fitness is essential during the summer months. "To keep your hair healthy and shining, you must protect it from the hot sun."

The styles for men and women are changing, Jie says. "For women, the straight styles that we see are reflecting the new coiffure looks, as seen on Nicole Kidman and Pamela Anderson.

"These Barbie looks created with big hair curlers [bigoudies] are a throwback to the popular styles of the '60s. Watch for big curls and dramatic statements of colour in hues of ginger," Jie says.

"More hair and more colour is the future trend for men. The short styles, as seen on Justin Timberlake and Eminem, will be out and long hair and colour will be in."

In the Jie Hair Collection 04, Jie presented minimal, classic, tailor-made, intelligent styles – styles reflecting individual personalities, bone structure and healthy hair. The styles are long for both men and women, with the emphasis on the colour ginger.

CAROL'S TIPS

SKIN CARE: NeoStata launches a revolutionary new cosmetic category. Cosmecedures are cosmetic procedures strong enough to be used at a doctor level and safe enough to be used in the comfort of your own home. The collection includes a microdermabrasion system, exfoliating peel system and an acne peel system. It is easy to use and the results are excellent. The exfoliating peel removes all the dead cells on the surface of your skin, leaving it youthful and fresh.

Chanel presents a "Precision" event, the unveiling of Hydramax, a new cream that corrects and prevents dehydration at its source. It's available in three textures – cream, gel cream and fluid.

NARS Aqua Gel Hydrator is an ultra-luxurious, lightweight, gel-cream mask comprised of 87 per cent water to deliver intense hydration to dull, dehydrated skin. Leave it on overnight for best results. Nourishing eye cream, also from NARS, promises to revitalize the eye area by improving the delicate skins resilience.

Clinique's Moisture Surge is an excellent spritz for thirsty skin relief. With one quick spray, this aloe-activated water immediately comforts the skin.

For a golden bronzed look try Clinique's new Quick Body Bronze Tinted Self-Tanner Mousse – it just glides on without streaking.

Clear Difference Advanced Oil-Control Hydrator from Estee Lauder is a light moisturizer that hydrates inside while leaving a perfectly matte appearance outside. To enhance the results of this product, the Clear Difference Deep Pore Purifying Facial clay mask provides oily skin with a deep cleaning that rebalances the skin without oil rebound, so that skin is left shine-free. It is excellent for teenagers.

Clinique beauty products

B. Kamins Lip Balm SPF 20 is a soothing treatment that helps to heal and protect lips making them kissable at all times. Also from B. The extensive collection is based on botanical-derived extracts chosen for their nourishing, soothing and relaxing properties and their exfoliating and antioxidant action. They are not only effective but the scents are light and exquisite. Quench your body with Cranberry Body Balm. It's not only nourishing, but the scent is divine. To purchase go to their website www.ebodytreatments.com

FOUNDATION: Estee Lauder's Amber Bronze Air Bronzer is as light as air and warms the skin with a sun-kissed finish. Wear solo or dust over foundation.

Luminous Face Fluid from Chanel brings a golden glow to the face with a shimmering iridescent effect – available in one shade: Sunkissed.

NARS Eye Brightner is a dual-ended wand that makes application child's play. It contains a weightless eye primer that creates an ideal canvas for the creamy concealer, and prevents unsightly creasing.

SWEET CHEEKS: Sweep a Touch of Bronze on your cheekbones and dust lightly over your whole face, another treat from Clinique.

NARS' Penny Lane Cream Blush in Nude Pink glides on like a second skin with just the right highlights.

EYES: Lancome presents Hypnose, a powerful new mascara that promises to add volume to six times your natural lash thickness.

Chanel's Aqualumiere Color Lip Shine

Estee Lauder introduces two new additions to the Artist's Lip and Eye Pencils Collection. New Artist's Mechanical Lip and Eye Pencil glides on easily with its dual-ended automatic applicator that has co-ordinating colours for all.

Chanel's new Ombre Unique Crème Illuminating Eye shadow is soft as silk and does not fade.

NARS eyeliner pencil in mint green is a must-have.

Revlon's Cream eye shadow in Limited Edition Tropicolor from their CopaCabana Beach Summer 2004 Collection shimmers in four natural hues inspired by the tropics – stunning!

LIPS: Chanel's brand new Aqualumiere Sheer Color Lip Shine features 15 gorgeous shades that are both nourishing and hydrating.

Clinique's new Color Surge Bare Brilliance Lipstick contains an innovative reflective pearl system to maximize shine to its peak.

Rouge Glamour by Lise Watier has intense colour with incomparable comfort and a colour story that is simply enchanting.

And try Visage's "C Stick" with SPF 15 to keep your lips kissable all summer.

HAIR: Hydra-Destress Complex from Kerastase is formulated specifically for dry itchy scalps and dry hair. It calms and moisturizes simultaneously.

L'Oreal Professional presents two new lines to help beautify your hair. Volume Extreme is a new root-lift volume booster that gives fine, limp, flat hair density. Shine Curl gives your curls ultra shine in good weather or bad.

New L'Oreal lines for your hair

FRAGRANCE: Estee Lauder's Summer in Bloom fragrances are a lighter, refreshing version of her classic scents, Pleasures, Beautiful and Intuition. They are smartly presented in a vividly-coloured vase to define the scent.

Allure Homme Sport is Chanel's latest edition to their men's perfume collection. It is an exhilarating citrus scent that embraces a green aquatic freshness and is warmed with the South America Tonka Bean. The bottle is broad and sleek with a sexy black rubberized cap.

Attraction from Lancome is a new encounter between Patchouli and Iris. Flower and wood unite to form femininity and strength that create the name "Attraction." Wear it and watch the response!

Echo Fragrance, new from Davidoff seems to capture the city in a bottle. It is exhilarating and sensual with a fresh, woody spiced scent – it's like liquid air.

Ladies, you will want to try Kenneth Cole's "Black" Body Lotion, which is irresistible.

Lise Watier's Spa mist is a cocktail of freshness whose lemon fresh smell is revitalizing.

Just Cavalli for Him and Her is very sensuous, like the men and women who wear the designer's fashion line, these two fragrances are distinctive, but at the same time united. Cavalli for Her is an oriental floral with the carnal sweetness of the Powdery Musks. Cavalli for Him is woody, aromatic and quite invigorating. The flacons' fronts are both a Plexiglas sheath enclosing the signature Just Cavalli motifs – the zebra and the python. The back is made of solid pure glass covered with a striped decoration – a real piece of art.

New Bath and Hair products from Givenchy are wonderful! The delicate Hair Mist is light and protects against bad odours and the Bath Gel exfoliates and polishes the skin. Of course, the scent is superb.

Battle of The Teen Idols

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Since the newest teenaged trends have emerged, several über-stylish girls have taken front and centre in our minds. And as they battle for supremacy in the movies, on TV and in Wal-Marts, one thing is certain – we just can't get enough.

The girls of today are part rock star, part girl-next-door. They say they'd prefer Sketchers when we all know they'd take the Manolos, and that they'd rather be having a sleepover with friends as they're partying at the Oscars. Yet despite all these contradictions, we love them just the same, because they seem, well, human!

These girls have access to all the hottest designer clothes, and without even knowing it have become the newest fashion templates. In a recent issue of Elle magazine, Mischa Barton was featured as the doll to their dress-up fantasies. The 18 year old was gussied up in everything from Chanel to Miu Miu while chatting about boys and school.

Perhaps the greatest thing about these new darlings is their obviously flawed behaviour. They have boy trouble, just like any girl. As rumours of the love triangle between Lindsay Lohan, Aaron Carter and Hilary Duff continue to surface, they remind you more and more of your own high school traumas. Lines like, "She started it" and "I wish it would just stop" are just plain funny because they make you feel like a kid again.

These girls are different because of their carefree attitudes. They aren't trying to prove anything, they just enjoy the spotlight. I walk proudly in my cut-off Lizzie McGuire T-shirt, because I know it doesn't stand for anything.

This carefree attitude has grabbed us – and held on. You may consider yourself above the trend, but no matter how hard you try, there will come a day when you find yourself singing, "You're so yesterday."

Victoria Spa at the InterContinental Toronto Centre

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Torontonians need not travel far to experience an exotic spa/hotel vacation. In fact, you can just hop the subway – steps away from Union Station lies Victoria Spa on the third floor of the newly renovated ultra-modern InterContinental Toronto Centre at 225 Front St. West.

SPA Life

Victoria Spa is a hidden oasis in downtown Toronto. The spa is 10,000 square feet with 12 private treatment rooms, a large swimming pool with a sculpted-metal waterfall, a solarium pedicure and manicure bay with a juice bar and a private outdoor terrace.

"We have 22 therapists on-hand including manicurists, pedicurists, message therapists, holistic practitioners and full service estheticians," says Nicole Bookman, spa director and key makeup artist for the spa owned by Victoria Sutherland, who before opening her present day establishment made a name for herself on Avenue Road., servicing many of the high-end hotels in the Yorkville area.

Bookman describes the spa's décor as Balinese with both Romanesque and Asian influences. The environment is soothing with lots of natural light coming through the solarium over the tropical pool surrounded by palm trees and rock formations.

Victoria Spa offers the perfect solace for their celebrity clientele, who include Catherine Zeta Jones, Yoko Ono, Kim Basinger and Sylvester Stallone.

Best of all is the array of services available; facials include the Original Victoria Facial with Yonka - a European skincare line and the spa's specialty Ayurveda facials using Sundari and Kama Ayurveda, Indian skincare brands. Other services include body treatments, waxing, hand and foot care and makeup applications done with Movie, an Italian makeup line.

Their signature treatments include the Head to Toe Reviver, its three treatments in one procedure that includes a Dead Sea exfoliation, an herbal body wrap and a botanical facial. The Herbal Body Glow Polish consists of two types of exfoliation followed by a hydrating aromatherapy Swedish massage.

Also popular is the Gentleman and Lady's Time Out starting with the couple's pedicure, they're separated for a facial and come back together to partake in a Swedish/Aromatherapy Massage. Bookman says the spa will gladly customize a package for you.

The luxurious hotel with superior and deluxe rooms and 68 suites overlooking the city is the official hotel of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra. Musical and non-musical guests of the InterContinental Toronto Centre can select from three Ultimate Spa Packages that all include superb accommodations on the Club Floor, a welcome spa gift, valet parking, breakfast, and so much more. Kosher meals are available upon advance notice at an additional charge.

The packages are Relax and Rejuvenate with an 80-minute specialty massage, Tranquility for Two, which includes the 90 minute, Victoria Couples Massage; and the Victoria Spa Escape for serious spa goers that allows for a choice of four of eight selected services.

"The InterContinental Toronto Centre has a great reputation with people who stay here from all over the world. The space allowed Victoria to come in and create the spa of her dreams," adds Bookman.

For more information contact Victoria Spa at 416-413-9100 or online at: www.victoriaspa.com. To book a hotel/spa package call the InterContinental Toronto Centre at 416-597-1400 or online at www.torontocentre.intercontinental.com.

Diabetes drug may be used to fight breast cancer

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Metformin, a drug commonly used in the treatment of diabetes, may also help treat breast cancer.

Studies are now being carried out by a research team led by Pamela Goodwin, director of Mount Sinai Hospital's Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre, who is being honoured with the Israel Cancer Research Fund's (ICRF) Scientific Award on June 9.

The metformin study grew out of research the team has done on the relationship between obesity and breast cancer. Obesity, Goodwin said, raises the insulin levels in the body. Insulin helps tumours grow. Breast cancer cells, she explained, have insulin receptors in them, and so are more able to accept the excess insulin and use it to increase tumour growth.

Goodwin's study aims to show whether, since metformin lowers insulin levels in diabetics, it can also lower them in those with breast cancer, thus inhibiting tumour growth.

The research is in the early stages and the team is still recruiting participants, she said. She estimates the results will be out in about a year-and-a-half.

Later research will investigate if metformin can also prevent tumours from returning, Goodwin said.

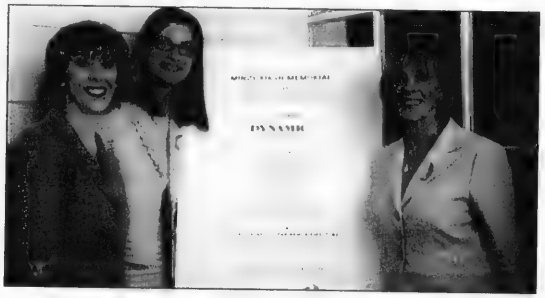
Goodwin has also been involved in researching the impact of obesity on breast cancer, and the psychological effects of breast cancer on young women and those getting chemotherapy.

Another cross-Canada study tried to reproduce an earlier study claiming that attending breast cancer support groups leads to longer survival. According to Goodwin's findings, while support groups were a big help in improving mood and in controlling pain, they had no effect on survival rates.

Goodwin's award will be presented at the ICRF's gala, which will be held on June 9 at the Sheraton Centre.

Proceeds from the gala, which is being held in partnership with the Canadian Breast Cancer Foundation, will fund scientific research in Israel and in Canada, as well as a digital mammography machine with a stereotactic biopsy attachment at the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital. Marvelle and Murray Koffler and their family are being honoured with the ICRF's humanitarian award at the event.

For more information or to reserve, call 416-487-5246 or visit the ICRF website at www.icrfonline.org.



FIGHTING OVARIAN CANCER: Taube Zeifman, Joanna Slone and Anita Gertin were co-chairs of the 1st Annual Mindy Kirsh Memorial Bridge to The Cure Bridge & Mah Jongg Luncheon, held at the Donalda Club. Proceeds from the sold-out event were in support of ovarian cancer research at The Princess Margaret Hospital. The women lost their friend Mindy Kirsh, 52, to ovarian cancer one year ago and decided to organize the fundraiser to help raise funds for research into the disease. The tournament raised $30,000.

Foundation awards 23 scholarships to diabetics

The Diabetes Hope Foundation and its founder and chair Barbara Pasternak, have awarded 23 $2,500-scholarships to students who have achieved strong academic performance, while at the same time managing the challenges of diabetes, participating in extra-curricular activities and working for their community.

The scholarships will help offset the financial strain that the disease puts on their families.

The awards were presented by Pasternak recently at Hart House of the University of Toronto.

A media release explains that the students receiving the scholarships "are in their transitional year from pediatric to adult health care...the Diabetes Hope Scholarship program is a critical element of DHF's commitment to enhancing the lives of children and adolescents living with diabetes."

Students come from all over Ontario, including the Greater Toronto Area, Belleville, Ottawa, Burlington, Huntsville, and Orleans. Pasternak, who has two children with type 1 diabetes, founded the diabetes Hope Foundation in 1999 to deal with funding and service gaps that exist for families and children living with diabetes.

The media release notes that "managing diabetes can cost a family between $2,600 to $10,000 per child per year, depending upon the severity of the disease."

So far, scholarships to the value of $220,000 have been awarded to 85 students.

Among this year's winners are Michael Goldberg from Thornhill, who is studying science and kinesiology; Ottawa's Daniel Kagedan, taking music; and Sara Kirchner from Burlington, who wants to play university level hockey.

Other winners will be studying computer animation, medicine, business, fine arts and engineering. – L.S.

Comedian follows in the footsteps of Canadian greats

By TAMMY STONE
Special to The CJN

The Second City, which opened its doors in Toronto in 1973, has launched the careers of comedic greats Dan Aykroyd, Gilda Radner, Mike Myers and many others.

Matt Baram grew up a huge fan and devoted follower of their work.

Now, at 32, Baram is living his dream. Just five years after moving to Toronto from Edmonton to make it as an actor, he's a veteran of the Second City Mainstage, performing in his third show. "Invasion Free Since 1812", the company's 55th revue.

The show is exemplary Second City, a collaborative effort between the producers, director and SC alumnus Bob Martin – who just won a Writer's Guild Award for his work on the popular TV series Slings and Arrows – and cast members Baram, Paul Constable, Sandy Jobin-Bevans, Jamillah Ross and Naomi Snieckus.

"Invasion Free Since 1812" takes many jabs at what defines Canada in relation to our superpower neighbour to the south. So Jobin-Bevans plays a hilarious pot-smoking Paul Martin, Constable a gay employee seeking maternity leave, and Baram a potential victim of a shooting: Jobin-Bevans wants to kill him for stealing his coffee mug, but is thwarted by the bureaucracy involved in getting a gun license in this country.

Baram stands out as a neurotic, evasive businessman stuck fending off a deadpan tax auditor. His physical humour and comic timing are impeccable here, as in the scene that has Jobin-Bevans and Baram playing former marketing executives turned members of the Young Republican Party out on a cross-country university tour telling students how they can blame all their problems on Osama bin Laden.

Matt Baram

The youngest child of three sons born to Jewish parents running a deli in Alberta, Baram says that as a kid, "I made my mom laugh, but I have a feeling she was a really easy audience. On Passover seders I was the one standing delivering my Richard Nixon routine saying 'no comment' to the four questions."

After studying acting at the Unviersity of Alberta, Baram moved to Toronto where, as he describes it, he waited tables, had an agent who never called him, and would come home from work to cry on his bed looking for a reason to quit his day job.

He started getting theatre work, but soon took matters into his own hands and produced Reefer Madness, a show based on the film that would become a huge hit and attain a sort of cult status. It was at that point that he was approached and asked to audition for Second City.

For a year and a half, Baram travelled across country in a van with the Touring Company, living the bohemian life, stopping in small communities and performing to audiences who were really appreciative of the company's work.

"There's something so romantic about that. You're paying your dues, and there's something so cool about knowing you're doing it at the time you're doing it."

Though becoming an actor – or worse, a comedian – isn't exactly a Jewish parent's fantasy, Baram had a lot of support growing up.

"My parents had miscarriages before I was born, so not only was I the youngest but I was a miracle. So it was like, 'do what you want. You're breathing, and you're happy, keep doing whatever keeps you doing that.'"

In 2002, Baram graduated from the Touring Company to Mainstage, which he calls "the gig to get ... Here there's a consistency, you're with people in the cast for longer durations, and you get to know them so well. There isn't a lot of movement of people in and out, so your work gets better. You can feel it getting better, you learn so much from your cast members."

The chemistry among them – in part the product of respect for different points of view – was noticed by the show's producers as well. This is the first time in years that all five cast members are doing two consecutive shows together. Generally, performers do around five revues before moving on to other things.

But they do keep coming back; alumni can't stay away from their training ground, often showing up for the improv sets that take place after the nightly shows. Baram recounts a time he was doing a Touring Company show in the Muskokas, and Martin Short and Catherine O'Hara dropped in for a set.

"It was insane. [Short] has a cottage there, so they just dropped in on this intimate cottage setting venue, community centre, and we did a scene called Dr. Know-It-All ... he was hysterical, he was making us laugh, he had the whole audience just completely crazy ... These are people you grow up and you idolize them, and they're there so I freaked out. I totally freaked out."

All in a day's work – a few weeks ago rockers Aerosmith popped in, and alumni like Colin Mochrie show up regularly. Baram is still taken aback when he walks into the SC building and sees the photos of his favourite comics adorning the walls. "I'm so thrilled, so jazzed by the fact that I get to be a part of [all this] just for a blink of an eye ... Second City, for whatever else it does in the present, is going to give me a foot in the door."

"Invasion Free Since 1812" runs at the Second City Mainstage, 56 Blue Jays Way, Toronto.

Comedian's play based on her journey

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

A Toronto-born comedian and actress's journey for self-fulfilment has paid off.

It's About Time, written and performed by Lori Pearlstein, 31, is a musical "dramedy" that follows the immigrant in her quest for stardom.

"The play is extremely autobiographical," she says. "It's 98.9 per cent based on the truth."

While the production is humorous, Pearlstein says there have been points in her journey that were both "serious and poignant," things she "did not want to belittle."

Since she was a child at arts camp, the native Torontonian dreamed of moving to New York City, and when opportunity knocked, she says, she took advantage of it.

"I knew it was the path I was supposed to take at an early age."

Five years ago, after fighting her parents, the immigration department and herself, Pearlstein packed her bags and set off for New York, what she calls "the theatre mecca of the world."

The move was a struggle in terms of motivation and money, she says. "I had to throw away everything. It was the hardest thing I've ever done in my life."

She says she got her first break doing stand-up at Yuk Yuk's in Toronto, but craved something bigger.

"I wanted to see if I could be a small fish in a big pond."

It's About Time premiered at New York's The Producer's Club in January and ran for one week.

"It was a work in progress, but it was still received very well," she says.

Being an artist with Jewish parents did challenge her plans, says Pearlstein, as it is not the most compatible mix.

"The traditional Jewish life path would be to become a doctor or a lawyer, something that offers more stability.

"My mom tried to suppress my urge. She didn't know how hard it was for me to want something so badly and not get support."

Pearlstein says it was difficult for her parents to accept certain scenes in the play, which explains her mother's reaction on opening night in New York: "A beautifully acted piece, a well-written story, but that was not my daughter's life."

But the play is "all based on perception," she says.

Lori Pearlstein

"I saw my childhood differently. I can understand where my mom is coming from. I wouldn't want to see my kid experiencing what I did at age 25 to 30. My parents wanted what was best for me."

She expects the Toronto audience will have a different response to her play than the New York crowd.

"It's fun in a nostalgic kind of way," she says.

In Toronto, people will be able to identify with the places she grew up visiting and with references she makes.

"In New York, people embraced the immigrant aspect. They could identify more with it," she says.

"It's a thought-provoking piece," she adds. "It deals with the choices I've made and the consequences I've faced."

Time is the play's central theme, she says, and a visible clock is ticking throughout.

"What's it ticking to?" she asks, building up the suspense.

"It would be anti-climactic if I gave away my plans for the future," she says with a laugh.

It's About Time runs May 27 to 29 and June 3 to 5, at 8:30 p.m. at the Alchemy Theatre, 133 Tecumseth St. (one block southwest of Queen and Bathurst streets). Tickets cost $20 and can be ordered by calling 416-648-9055.

Director breathes new life into opera

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

It was more than 25 years ago when The Death of Enkidu and the Merman of Orford, two riveting musical productions, made their debut.

Like many other premiere performances, they have yet to be seen again. And there isn't even a single tape for posterity's sake.

But that is about to change thanks to artistic director Lawrence Cherney.

The acclaimed founder of music theatre company Soundstreams Canada has spearheaded the revival of these works.

They will be performed at the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts from May 26-29, as part of SomersFest, aptly named for the composer of the productions, Harry Somers.

"We're breathing new life into these pieces," Cherney explains while sipping espresso at a downtown Toronto café. "It's not that they never had a chance, (but) they kind of got to first base and that was it. I don't presume to know that these works will endure, but the public has to see them in order to judge for itself."

Music revival or "reconstruction," as Cherney prefers, is part of the mandate of Soundstreams, now in its 21st year

The award winning organization presents everything from multi-choral spectaculars to thrilling operas, composed by living Canadian and international artists, along with providing music education.

The ultimate goal is to engage as many people as possible in "new music."

"You can really reach people," Cherney says, in reference to choral productions in particular. "You can get them excited about music from 25 years ago."

Cherney, 58, has been getting people excited about music for the majority of his life.

A seasoned oboe soloist and recitalist, he has commissioned or premiered some 150 works for the oboe and has performed before audiences in North America, Europe and Israel.

Along with being the visionary at Soundstreams, Cherney also founded the summer festival Music at Sharon, which kicked off in 1981 and enjoyed success for 13 years.

> Music 'reconstruction'

His musical creativity and contribution to the development of Canadian artists led to being named to the Order of Canada and being the recipient of the Chalmers National Music Award.

While growing up in Peterborough, Ont. Cherney's music grooming began, first on the piano at the tender age of five and later on the oboe, at the suggestion of his father, Harry.

"I came home and told my father was gong to play the trombone. My father said, 'if that's what you really want to do, then o.k., but I really like the sound of the oboe,'" Cherney recalls.

"So as a dutiful son, I went back, asked to play the oboe and the rest is history. And if it hadn't been for that, I'd probably be in the furniture business today."

By the early 1980s, the entrepreneurial itch prompted the musician to start up the Sharon festival, in the namesake village north of Newmarket, Ont. "I did a lot of themes at Sharon. I had a wonderful time," he reflects.

"I thought maybe this could go in the direction of Niagara on the Lake…But what we didn't have to sustain the festival was restaurants. It was a miracle people kept coming back only for the music."

Soundstreams' performances have multiple venues. In February, the company showcased "Canadian Voices", a choral production with six professional Canadian choirs performing a new work by Murray Schafer called The Fall Into Light, at the Barbara Frum Atrium in Toronto.

> 'It took tremendous creativity'

"The Schafer piece required a lot of interaction between the choirs, so we decided to put all the choirs on the atrium floor," Cherney explains.

"I had 700 people in the middle, surrounded by all the choirs….The extraordinary acoustics and the atrium's physical properties are unmatched."

The performance received rave reviews.

With The Death of Enkidu and the Merman of Orford, major reconstructions from the original have been made.

"Enkidu is having flashbacks as he looks back on his life…and flashbacks are hard to do on the operatic stage. So we decided to treat the singers as almost being instruments and all (flashback) actions are carried out through dance," Cherney says.

"It took tremendous creativity for somebody to take that score and actually recreate it."

Cherney is always on the hunt for new ideas and says he intends to create a distinctly Jewish piece.

"I'm interested in having somebody write a piece, on a big scale, that is rooted in Judaism," says the practiced shofar blower.

"Right now I'm exploring."

For tickets to SomersFest, phone the St. Lawrence Centre for the Arts box office at 416-366-7723 or call Soundstreams at 416-504-1282.

Film Festival Report: Richard Benjamin "is terrific, a really classy guy," said programming director Shlomo Schwartzberg after the close of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) earlier this month.

A special guest of the festival, the celebrated 66-year-old actor-director spent a lot of time with friends here, Schwartzberg reported. "He really loves Toronto. He described it as New York without the stress. He was a very gracious and a very unpretentious and genuine person."

During the fest, Benjamin introduced some films and was interviewed on stage by Toronto Star writer Martin Knelman. Soon after leaving Toronto, he was a special guest at the Jewish film festival in Vancouver.

The TJFF hosted a record 36 VIP guests this year, averaging three guest appearances every day. It also grew in other ways. Jumping in size from 59 to 88 screenings since last year, the fest made good use of the new Al Green Theatre at the Miles Nadal JCC, in addition to its usual venue, the Bloor Cinema.

"The transition went unbelievably smoothly and both venues had a really wonderful buzz," Schwartzberg said. "We had our most ambitious line-up this year. Based on the number of films shown, we're now the biggest Jewish film festival in North America." (By attendance, the TJFF ranks second in size to the San Francisco Jewish Film Festival.)

Repeat screenings of some of the TJFF's most popular offerings are planned for the fall and winter in the Sheppard Grande Theatre, Vaughan City Playhouse and Leah Posluns Theatre. Watch this space for details.

Silent Auction: The Winchevsky Centre is holding a silent auction to raise funds for the Morris Winchevsky School, its weekly secular Jewish cultural program for children, and Camp Naivelt, a progressive summer cottage community in Brampton.

Varied works by Toronto artists John Abrams, Sybil Goldstein, Carole Conde, Karl Beveridge, Johanna Householder and bh yale are being offered. The event, which is free and open to the public, also features ceramics, signed books, light refreshments and music by saxophonist Wally Brooker. 585 Cranbrooke Ave. Thursday, June 3, 7:30 p.m. 416-789-5502.

Names in the News: Following an age-old Broadway ritual, the lights in front of Toronto's Royal Alex, Princess of Wales and Canon theatres were dimmed at 8 p.m. on May 18 in tribute to actor Tony Randall, who died the day before at the age of 84… Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center is hosting a gala fund-raising tribute for Simon Wiesenthal, featuring Canadian hero Gen. Romeo Dallaire, CBC's Evan Solomon, mezzo-soprano Tsepora, author Irshad Manji and Los Angeles Rabbi Marvin Hier representing the 95-year-old Nazi hunter. It's at the Toronto Centre for the Arts on June 10… Five major recent projects by the Toronto architectural firm Diamond and Schmitt, Inc. are highlighted on the company's newly redesigned website, www.dsai.ca… Playwright Wendy Wasserstein, novelist Anne Roiphe, artist Tobi Kahn and theatre producer Daryl Roth are the honorees of the 15th annual Jewish Cultural Achievements Awards in the Arts to be held next week at New York's Plaza Hotel. The awards are sponsored by the National Foundation for Jewish Culture, whose executive director, Richard Siegel, is slated to receive a cultural leadership award for 25 years of devoted service.

Media Watch: Britain has protested to Syria and Lebanon over their hosting of a Hezbollah-controlled TV station that broadcasts anti-Semitic propaganda around the world. Foreign Secretary Jack Straw instructed his ambassadors to express London's "revulsion" at the broadcasts, which were said to contain "inflammatory material" meant to incite racial hatred. British owners of satellite antennas were able to pull the offensive material into their living rooms. Do any readers know whether Hezbollah-TV is accessible by satellite dish in Canada?

Irony and black humour infuse Holocaust work

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

As often happens on the first day of school, David Albahari recalls being asked to stand up and introduce himself to his Grade 2 class. The name was unusual to the teacher, so David was asked to explain his heritage.

"Jewish?" the teacher asked, quite puzzled.

"I didn't know there were any Jews still alive," he said.

David Albahari

It was the first time the award-winning writer, who grew up in the former Yugoslavia, had to confront his identity and the question of the Holocaust, an issue he now feels must engage the efforts of every generation.

In his recent book, Gotz and Meyer (Harvill Press/Random House), Albahari chooses to examine the horror of the Holocaust by focusing on the summer of 1942 when the Nazis exterminated the majority of Belgrade's Jews.

Using irony and black humour, Albahari examines humanity at its worst in an effort to understand the point at which people cross the line into immorality. The writer, who has been compared to Primo Levi and Eli Wiesel, uses a narrator one generation removed from the atrocities to explore the illusory nature of evil.

The namesakes of the book are the two SS officers who drove the 5,000 Jewish inmates from the Fairgrounds, a holding camp for the Jews of Belgrade, to their deaths by carbon monoxide poisoning in a hermetically sealed truck.

The story, written in one long paragraph, is told by a teacher who becomes consumed with his effort to reconstruct the lives of his relatives, many of whom died in that Saurer gas truck, and becomes obsessed by the nature of the two drivers, Willhelm Gotz and Erwin Meyer.

"One of the two, or so witnesses claim, came into the camp, played with the children, picked them up, even gave them chocolates," Albahari writes.

This image of innocence is juxtaposed with the description of Gotz, or was it Meyer, (the author often confuses the two) crouching under the truck, as the women and children waited inside, to move the exhaust pipe over so that the truck would fill with carbon monoxide poison.

Albahari describes the banality of Gotz and Meyer's conversation as they continue their drive while the carbon monoxide pumps into the truck and the Jews in the back scream "at their God with their last breath, asking him why he wasn't there, why he wasn't there yet, why he was never there?"

In his novel, Albahari brings together the persecutor and persecuted in an effort to reinterpret the events that defined that horrific period.

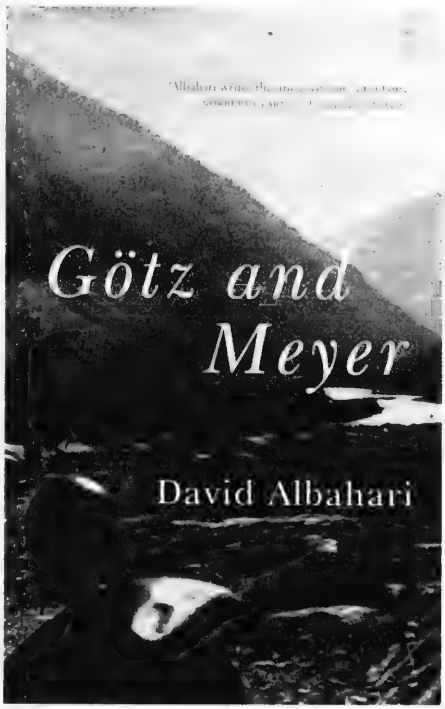
"We cannot simply blame the Holocaust on the whole German nation," Albahari said in an interview.

"These two characters, who are real, were not born as monsters. If you want to think of them before those evil things were done, you have to think of them in terms of normal happy and sad people like everyone else," he said.

Albahari, who now lives in Calgary, was in Toronto recently to read for the Harbourfront Reading Series. He has written 14 books in Serbian and is the winner of the Ivo Andric Awards for the best collection of short stories in Yugoslavia and the NIN award for the best novel.

Before coming to Canada, Albahari was president of the Jewish communities of Yugoslavia. When he accepted the honorary position, Albahari thought he was committing to four years of hand shaking at receptions and dinners.

"Then, in 1991, a new war began in Croatia. In 1992, it moved to Bosnia and in April of 1992, suddenly my honorary position became a full time job," Albahari said.



Before the beginning of the recent war, the former Yugoslavia was a federation of six different republics which came together in Belgrade, a city which brought together people from the Austrio-Hungarian and Turkish empires, and integrated both Sephardi and Ashkenazi Jews.

In 1991, the Jewish community consisted of somewhere between 7,000 or 8,000 people, with the largest community of 1,600 in Belgrade.

After the war began, Jewish refugees from Bosnia and Sarajevo began to flow into Belgrade. At one point, Albahari said there were 600 Jewish refugees that were being assisted by world Jewish organizations.

"Suddenly, my position became something very real and terrible in its own way. All these people left their homes, became refugees and lost everything they had," he said.

Although proud of his work as a Jewish community leader in Belgrade, Albahari felt that his life as a writer was slipping away.

"I felt that if I missed writing this book, it may never happen later," Albahari said.

In 1994, Albahari decided to accept a writer in residence position at the University of Calgary and moved to Canada with his wife, Bojana – who teaches English to new immigrants – and their two children.

When he arrived in Canada, the writer was surprised at the similarities between Canada and the former Yugoslavia.

"Of course, the systems are different. The former Yugoslavia was a communist country and Canada is not."

However, in the former Yugoslavia, defining identity became a challenge because there were different nations coming together under a federated system.

This is a challenge also faced by Canadian artists, Albahari said. While Canadians don't face the problems that were faced in the former Yugoslavia, new immigrants do find themselves "redefining something which is not completely defined.

"Identity in Canada must be very fluid," he said.

Albahari, who now considers himself Canadian, Jewish and Yugoslavian, in the old sense of the word, said he loves living with several identities.

"In a way, it is the Jewish experience. But it may be one of its problems as well."

Can campus faculty help Israel's image?

BY RACHEL POMERANCE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The belief that students are the main instigators of anti-Israel activity on college campuses is wrong – it's actually the faculty.

That's the premise of a soon-to-be released report by the Israel on Campus Coalition, a group of 27 Jewish organizations that aid pro-Israel activists at U.S. colleges, and the American-Israeli Co-operative Enterprise, a group that aims to bolster the U.S.-Israel relationship.

A few high-profile anti-Israel or anti-Semitic acts on some campuses have created the misconception that anti-Israel activity is widespread and directed by students, said the American-Israeli Cooperative Enterprise's executive director, Mitchell Bard, who prepared the report.

"The real problem is more insidious because it's not as visible, and that is the absence of scholars who can teach about Israel in a way that is factual and even remotely sympathetic to Israel," said Bard.

His report was to be released last weekend at Hillel's International Lay Leadership Conference in Washington.

At Columbia University, the administration recently created a faculty committee to examine the extent of permissible free speech by academics.

Columbia president Lee Bollinger said he didn't believe free speech could excuse intimidation in the classroom, and he asked the committee to examine the issue. But the committee found no evidence of "systematic bias in teaching on the campus."

Many Jews, however, maintain that there is a systematic bias against Israel throughout academia – and no quick fix.

"Students come and go," but "faculty can be there for generations, so they really have a huge impact on what happens on that campus," said Rachel Fish, New York regional director of the David Project, which teaches about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict in high schools, colleges and communities.

But the problem goes beyond the issue of anti-Israel faculty who turn the classroom into a bully pulpit, Fish said.

"Jewish faculty are absolutely reluctant to speak up" for Israel, she said.

Faculty behaviour will change only if the impetus comes from within the university, Fish and others said.

"Somebody coming in from the outside and challenging a faculty member means nothing. Somebody coming in from the inside, a peer, someone who can challenge your tenure, your next promotion," carries meaning and pressure, said Ed Beck, who teaches psychology at Alvernia College in Pennsylvania and is president of Scholars for Peace in the Middle East, an international faculty network that tries to counter anti-Israel and anti-Semitic teaching.

But some say that pushing for pro-Israel faculty members could undermine the integrity of the academy.

The topic has created a stir among Jewish faculty on Internet discussion groups, and was the topic of a panel discussion at the last meeting of the Association for Jewish Studies, said Norman Stillman, who teaches Judaic history at the University of Oklahoma.

"On the one hand, we all have our private views, loyalties and political affiliations. On the other hand, many of us are old-fashioned enough to believe that our job at the university is not to propagandize but to discuss issues with academic dispassion," Stillman said.

Bard stressed that the purpose of his report isn't to oust or criticize professors that rail against Israel, but to foster more accurate scholarship on Israel.

His group has created a scholarship fund that would give matching funds to universities that hire U.S. and Israeli academics as visiting professors and offer scholarships to students who want to become scholars on Israel.

He also proposes that pro-Israel scholars mentor faculty, train faculty from non-Middle East studies departments to teach courses on Israel, and endow chairs and departments in Israel studies.

"The creation of chairs and Israel studies centres has the greatest potential for long-term influence on the course of scholarship, the development of new talent, and support for pro-Israel students," Bard wrote.

But not everyone agrees with Bard's approach.

"It sounds to me like a very clear attempt to politicize academic departments," said Hasdai Westbrook, editor of New Voices magazine, written by and for Jewish students.

Political activism has its place on campus, but not in academia, said Westbrook, who stressed that he had not yet seen the report.

But Bard says his proposal may just be a stopgap solution – and not the only one. Those involved say the report is simply a start toward showcasing the issues and taking a stab at solutions.

Bypassing Middle East studies departments to find professors who can teach fairly about Israel will create a cadre of Israel scholars who eventually can affect hiring and teaching patterns in Middle East studies, he said.

Wayne Firestone, director of the Israel on Campus Coalition and Hillel's Center for Israel Affairs, agrees that faculty need to be seriously involved for change to take place.

But he acknowledges that most professors feel that becoming members and advocates of Jewish groups would compromise their work.

Israeli-Euro team sinks teeth into addiction

By YUVAL DROR
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — A joint Israeli-European team has recently developed a revolutionary system for weaning addicts off of drugs – a prosthetic tooth that releases medication to reduce the addict's craving.

The scientists produced a microcomputer that is planted in a prosthetic tooth in the mouth of the addict, many of whom suffer from dental problems and missing teeth. In an adjacent prosthetic tooth sits a tiny cell containing the medication, which is released by the computer into the addict's mouth.

The researchers intend to miniaturize the device to the extent that both the microcomputer and the medication cell can be planted together in one prosthetic tooth.

The project is headed by engineer Bentzi Biesky and dentist Dr. Andy Wolf, both of the Assouta Medical Centre in Tel Aviv. The two originally developed the device for patients suffering from dry mouths.

In that case, the mechanism is planted in an artificial tooth and monitors the moisture level in the individual's mouth. When the mouth's moisture drops below a predetermined level, the device transmits tiny electric jolts to the nerve that controls the saliva glands, thus increasing the mouth's moisture level.

"Because they developed the tiny electronics and mechanics that can be implanted in the mouth, the question arose whether it is possible to utilize the technology to develop a device that can release drugs in a controlled manner," explained Dr. Haim Mahal, head of treatment and rehabilitation at the Israel Anti-Drug Authority.

Mahal said clinical tests of the medication-dispensing device will be carried out in Europe until the end of 2005. An additional test will be conducted on animal subjects suffering from diabetes, with the device releasing insulin.

It is still difficult at this stage to estimate when the device would be put on the market, he said.

"With the current method, addicts need to get to the drug treatment centre on a daily basis in order to receive their medication," Mahal said. "This is problematic because although they do want to rid themselves of their addiction, sometimes they are unable [to come] or not interested in getting to the clinic. This is the reason that only 20 per cent of patients successfully overcome their addiction."

Injury doesn't stop basketball all-star

By JOSHUA CASPER
Special to The CJN

Adversity has the effect of eliciting talents, which, in prosperous circumstances, would have lain dormant. –Horace

NEW YORK — Shayna Greenwald's passion for basketball and commitment to Judaism embody her identity, and her tenacity to overcome adversity has landed her all-star honours playing for Yeshiva University after experiencing what could have been a career-ending injury.

Two years ago, Greenwald suffered a torn knee ligament that might have brought her basketball career to an end. But she bounced back and her dedication to her country, her sport and her religion culminated in 2003, when the five-foot-one point guard helped lead Canada to a silver medal at the 10th Pan-American Maccabi Games in Santiago, Chile.

"Some people write a book or speak. Sports is a way that I can express myself and my Jewish culture. To represent Jewish Canada was truly rewarding," said Greenwald, a native of Toronto.

"The energy in the gym, for every game – it was the most intense basketball I've ever played. People were playing their hearts out. Everyone was stepping it up to a higher level. You either played your best, or you were embarrassed on the court."

From an early age, basketball has been an integral part of Greenwald's life. Yet, when she hoped to join a league at the Toronto JCC, she found there were no leagues for girls. Undeterred, Greenwald joined the boys' league.

"For a lot of girls, that could have stopped someone's career. While there were not very many opportunities, she overcame that," says Sy Herling, head coach of Maccabi Canada's women's basketball team, who also coached her as a youth. "Shayna didn't see anything wrong with playing with the guys. She was as good as or better than many of the boys, capable of a lot of things that they were. More girls became involved with basketball in the JCC, and we created girls leagues. Shayna was a big part of that."

After two successful seasons as the point guard for Neptune Day School, Greenwald went on to Ulpanat Orot, a Hebrew high school that did not have a basketball program. Greenwald made the decision to transfer to CHAT, where she could resume playing basketball as a junior.

However, during a JCC Maccabi tournament in West Orange, N.Y., Greenwald partially tore a ligament in her knee and then re-injured it the following year.

"I knew that I had torn my ACL and my basketball season was over. I was upset," recalls Greenwald.

She used that as motivation, making it back in time to play Grade 11 volleyball and softball. As a senior, she finally made it onto the basketball court.

"She was desperate to play in her senior year to make an impact. She's the type of girl not to let up. That's what set her apart," said Aubrey Zimmerman, her coach at CHAT.

Greenwald, who was named CHAT's athlete of the year, was among the team leaders in scoring, assists and steals, and hit the biggest shot of the season, a game wining buzzer-beater to win the CHAT Israel Becker Invitational.

"CHAT had never won a tournament. Everyone went nuts. Ramaz was a huge rival and she broke their backs." said Zimmerman. "She had a lot of fire about her. You need that. Shayna was a leader."

After high school, Greenwald spent a year in Israel and then enrolled at the University of Toronto. College basketball games often conflicted with the Sabbath, so Greenwald's commitment to her Jewish faith forced her to make a difficult choice.

"I couldn't play on the university team. Without my Judaic studies as the driving force, what would be the point?" explained Greenwald. "I was not fulfilled."

Instead, she decided to attend Yeshiva University in New York, which offers a Division III basketball program.

"Shayna and basketball are synonymous. She loves the game," said Karen Greene, head coach of the Yeshiva Lady Maccabis. "Shayna is tenacious in reaching her goals."

Last year, Greenwald earned an All-Hudson Valley Conference selection and this year, she was named player of the week twice, along with MVP of the Betty Shabazz Tournament, when she hit a game winning three-pointer with three seconds left.

While she will remain in New York to work for Lehman Brothers as a financial analyst, Greenwald's heart is in Canada. She'll likely be part of Team Canada for the 2005 Maccabiah Games in Israel.

"I love being a Canadian, I love the game and I love Judaism," she said. "I just hope there is another guard out there who is not going to settle but also take a chance to play and shine."

Sakhnin brushes aside Haifa for place in history

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

RAMAT GAN, Israel — Almost the entire town of Sakhnin turned out last week to watch the local team smash Hapoel Haifa 4-1 with a second-half blitz, including two goals from Lior Assoulin, to become the first team with Arab players to win the State Cup.

Things didn't start off well for Bnei Sakhnin. At the end of a tepid first half, Haifa's talented young playmaker Gil Vermot sent a clever cross in to Shai Dahan, who headed it in seconds before the half-time whistle. The goal sent more than 25,000 Sakhnin fans into a state of shock.

But after the break, Sakhnin came out determined to turn the game around and at the 62-minute mark, Lior Assoulin lifted a corner to Avi Danan, who headed in the equalizer. Sakhnin fans erupted and two fans received medical attention after fainting.

Three minutes later, Dariusz Jaskewicz put through Assoulin and the striker slotted the ball into the net from the edge of the box to make it 2-1. From that moment, the Sakhnin fans started singing their victory song composed by Mussa al-Hafez, a wedding singer from Jenin.

At the 76-minute mark, Jaskewicz blasted in a shot that put the Galilee town ahead 3-1. Another two fans fainted and Sakhnin chair Mazen Ghnaem called on the fans not to invade the field.

Assoulin put the icing on the cake when he hammered in a penalty after being brought down by Haifa keeper Anan Fero.

As President Moshe Katsav handed the trophy to Sakhnin, the club's fans erupted in a celebration that lasted well into the night. In the town itself, which had been empty until the end of the game, those who hadn't made the journey to Ramat Gan began their celebrations. Fireworks were set off at the town hall and thousands poured out into the streets to be joined later by the fans returning from the game.

Even before the end of the 90 minutes of regulation play, the reservoir of verbal crowns applicable to Bnei Sakhnin had already run dry. "Historic" is not a word generally used in connection with a soccer championship. But in the Israeli Arab Galilee town, they spoke of a "Sacred Day – The Independence Day of the Palestinian Arabs of Israel."

Others, like Ghnaem, said it was a day of pride for the State of Israel and that for the first time, Bnei Sakhnin were proud to be Israelis.

The historic achievement, of course, lies in the arrival of the Arabs – tens of thousands came to the stadium – who made their way from the very fringes of the margins to the very centre of events, and enjoyed being the winners.

Immediately after the Arab captain of the team held aloft the golden cup trophy, Shawki Khatib, chair of the Israeli Arab umbrella group, the Higher Monitoring Committee for Arab Affairs in Israel, said, "This is a beef against all those who voice beefs against the Arabs all year long, who have a beef with us from every direction. This is a beef with the state, saying that despite all the discrimination, we can compete as equals for the State Cup."

The sweet taste of victory came mixed with other flavours, of course. There were those who felt confusion as they watched Bnei Sakhnin players drape themselves with the Israeli flag as they took their victory lap around Ramat Gan Stadium. There were those who felt ill at ease, with Palestinian casualties mounting in Rafah and the Arab commemoration of Naqba (Catastrophe) Day, as the Arabs call the anniversary of the 1948 establishment of the State of Israel.

The community of Sakhnin itself has gone through long years of struggle with the state, in the course of which lands were confiscated and young people killed in violent confrontations. In the Sakhnin bleachers in Ramat Gan, blue-and-white flags were waved along with portraits of two Sakhnin residents shot dead by police in the outskirts of the city in October 2000.

A-Shams Radio and other Arab media outlets didn't deal with these issues on game day, however. They focused instead on the carnival of the Israeli Arab public. Author and journalist Salem Joubran, editor of the Sakhnin-based Al-Ahli newspaper, said he had never had the slightest interest in soccer, but he shed a tear when the final whistle blew.

"This is the greatest of joyous occasions, a joyous occasion that bridges between the Jews and the Arabs," Joubran said.

"This can be a breakthrough," he said of the victory by the Sakhnin team, which has both Arab and Jewish players on its roster. "If Jews and Arabs can play together and win a cup, they can also do business together and simply live together.

Now, Joubran continued, "one needn't be a big ideologue in order to engage in Arab-Jewish co-operation. We can – and we should – be together."

A film review over coffee

I was sitting in a packed Starbucks in downtown Toronto with a girlfriend on Sunday afternoon. We were sipping our steaming beverages and exchanging dating stories from the past week. Hers were more eventful than mine and I listened intently. I was about to offer her my "expert" dating advice when Igal Hecht and Ron Furman walked in.

30 something

By MIRIAM PORTER

We had just seen their latest documentary, The Chosen People, at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival. I loved it for several reasons. It explores the lives of messianic Jews and exposes their beliefs and practices. Hecht and Furman, the filmmakers, interview two sisters in their 20s who were brought up in a traditional Jewish home who now believe Jesus is the Messiah. It includes many interviews with Jews for Jesus members and also the counter-evangelical movement, Jews for Judaism. It was the first time, to my knowledge, that a film focused on this religious group.

The low-budget movie, which was shot mostly in the filmmaker's hometown of Toronto, captures some wonderful moments. A young messianic girl on a busy street corner tries to persuade passersby to join Jews for Jesus. She approaches an older Jewish woman, who begins arguing with her. Finally, the older woman snaps, "Go convert the Muslims in Israel who are killing us!" I applauded and cheered along with the other audience members.

Next time I am approached by Jews for Jesus, I might use the same line. It would probably be more effective than my previous confrontation. A tall burly-haired man once approached me outside a subway stop and handed me a pamphlet. When I realized, to my disappointment, it was not a half-price coupon for the shoe store on the corner, I tore it up in front of him and screamed, "I'm Jewish!" I gave him the dirtiest look my face would contort to and walked much faster than usual all the way home, hoping he was not following me.

The Chosen People is an unbiased film, but focuses more on the two converted sisters and Jews for Jesus than on Jews for Judaism. It affected me because it deals with issues that directly influence the contemporary Jewish world – my world.

A question-and-answer session was held with the filmmakers after the screening. A curious audience member asked why Jewish youth were not given more screen time. I agree with the filmmakers when they replied, "This film is about messianic Jews and we were telling their story."

However, I was disappointed when Hecht avoided the audience question, "Where do your values lie?" He did not take a stand for either group. Instead he passed the microphone over to his partner. Furman said, "I am a Jew." The audience applauded; it was exactly what they wanted to hear.

When the duo entered Starbucks, I wanted to have a question-and-answer session of my own. Unfortunately, I was not prepared. When I was getting ready to leave earlier, it was rainy and cold and all I wanted to wear was comfort clothes. Sticking out from my long denim jacket were my pajama bottoms. My hair was up in a ponytail and I was not wearing any makeup. Plus, my little yellow book of Post-it notes and brown recycled napkins from Starbucks were my writing paper options. There was no way I was going to introduce myself in my unprofessional state. I will wait until their new film, YID 2, is released next year and then I will wait for them. By then, I will be properly dressed and have a real pad of paper.

But I didn't want my Starbucks experience to be totally uneventful, so I smiled at the very cute dark-haired guy with dimples drinking tea with his friends at the table across from me. Maybe he liked girls in pajamas who wrote on napkins. My friend looked at me in mock horror and whispered, "Miriam, he's like 21!" I laughed and replied, "Fine, I was just about to give you some brilliant dating advice anyways."

HONEY-GLAZED LEMON CHICKEN

Approx. 2, 7 lb. each roasting chickens, rinsed, patted dry
2 1/2 cups fresh lemon juice (from about 12 large lemons)
coarse kosher salt
freshly ground black pepper
1/2 cup honey, heated until pourable

Place each chicken in heavy-duty resealable plastic bag. Add 1 1/4 cups lemon juice to each. Seal bags; turn chickens to coat. Refrigerate at least 6 hrs. and up to 1 day, turning bags occasionally.

Preheat oven to 450°F. Drain chickens; pat dry. Sprinkle each with salt and pepper. Place chickens side by side, breast side down, on racks in large roasting pan. Roast 15 minutes. Reduce oven temperature to 375°F. Roast 45 minutes.

Turn chickens breast side up. Brush all over with honey. Continue to roast until cooked through and deep brown, basting with any juices in pan and brushing with honey occasionally, about 55 minutes longer. Transfer chickens to platter. Tent loosely with foil to keep warm and let stand 15 minutes.

Meanwhile, pour pan juices into small saucepan. Spoon off fat. Rewarm pan juices. Season with salt and pepper. Serve chickens with pan juices.

Ancient values into modern lives

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

My minyan sponsored a lunch and learn session a few weeks ago, and in the midst of it, I suddenly came to appreciate the wonder of Jewish study. While the teacher was a Jewish scholar, the class was composed of fine minds of every discipline: women and men with vast knowledge in other spheres spending "quality time" with rather esoteric texts.

These minyan members are mostly people who care about Jewish affairs, values and texts, but, still, this might be the first century in Jewish life that exposes Jewish writings to so many other disciplines.

What happens when a psychoanalyst reads the Bible carefully? What chemistry is released when a social worker confronts talmudic texts that speak to her concerns? Does the midrash have a message for a special education expert or a tax consultant? How does the knowledge explosion affect Jewish knowing?

Then there was the study itself. A biblical verse is examined because of its strange context. A Spanish Jew talks to us from his study a thousand years ago. A French Jew responds while Jews around the world listen. An Italian has his say. Then, a 20th-century rabbi who knows them all still must add a word or two, not missing the opportunity both to comment on the original text and to interpret the international, cross-century debate about that same text.

Even if this were your primary discipline of study, it would be strange, since so much respect is given in Jewish study to early sources. There is no assumption that the later the source, the better the interpretation. On the contrary, there is even a tradition that our interpretive force is waning. In so many other disciplines, early material quickly becomes obsolete. In our study, there is a constant desire to read ourselves into the ancient texts and to read those texts and bring their values into our lives.

The wisdom of bar and bat mitzvah Jews

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I was recently invited to speak about tikkun olam (repairing the world) at a bar and bat mitzvah class at Beth David Synagogue. I always enjoy these opportunities as they give me the chance to hear refreshing opinions from minds unscathed by the cerebral bulk of age and endless considerations that often dull the thoughts of the more mature.

There were about 12 youngsters around the table, and I launched the roundtable by stating that mystics have said a bar mitzvah should be celebrated even more than a wedding. I asked the group, in this light, if they were indeed excited about their great day and why.

One girl, who had already celebrated her bat mitzvah, said, "I loved going up to the bimah and feeling a real connection with God." She smiled widely, as though she had actually met God eye-to-eye.

A boy in the group, who will celebrate his bar mitzvah in the winter, stated that "the bar mitzvah was an old tradition" and he was much more intrigued by Buddhism than Judaism.

I wanted this young man to have every chance to take pleasure in his bar mitzvah, make it his own and glean something from it that would stay with him forever. The group therefore huddled and presented our Jewish-Buddhist friend with an option.

One of the boys said, "Why don't you compare a biblical character in your portion to a similar character in Buddhism? See what you come up with and what you learn about being Jewish."

The young "Buddhist Jew" said he liked that idea, and would try it.

The girls seemed to be more at ease with their upcoming bat mitzvahs. The boys struggled with the idea, and it seemed to weigh more heavily upon them. I considered that this might be in response to the emphasis Judaism has placed on the bar mitzvah as a stern rite-of-passage, whereas the bat mitzvah has more commonly been recognized as a celebration. No doubt this perception is manifested in the group's lessons.

Every group has its own characters, and this one was no different. The effusive boy among them said, "We are the chosen people and I feel proud at having the chance to stand in front of the synagogue and lead the congregation."

Having a dozen Jews in one room, regardless of their age, led to the inevitable – a debate, as the young teens challenged each other's ideas.

At one point, I asked the group if they would be born Jewish again, if they had the option. Most of them said yes, one said no, and a couple contemplated the question, unable to come up with an answer.

I sat back, listened and loved every minute of the dialogue and my time with the students. I was invigorated by the fantastic ideas that flooded the boardroom, and I am encouraged more than ever about the value of learning from others, whether they are six or 96. I also realized again the importance of challenging bar and bat mitzvah students with questions of deep significance that will stir them to appreciate the richness of their special moment and the meaning of actualizing it through their souls and personalities.

Our rabbis of blessed memory have said that ability to have mercy, to feel shame and to show benevolence are the three ingredients that define a Jew. Mazel tov to Beth David's bar and bat mitzvah kids and their families. I believe these children are on their way.

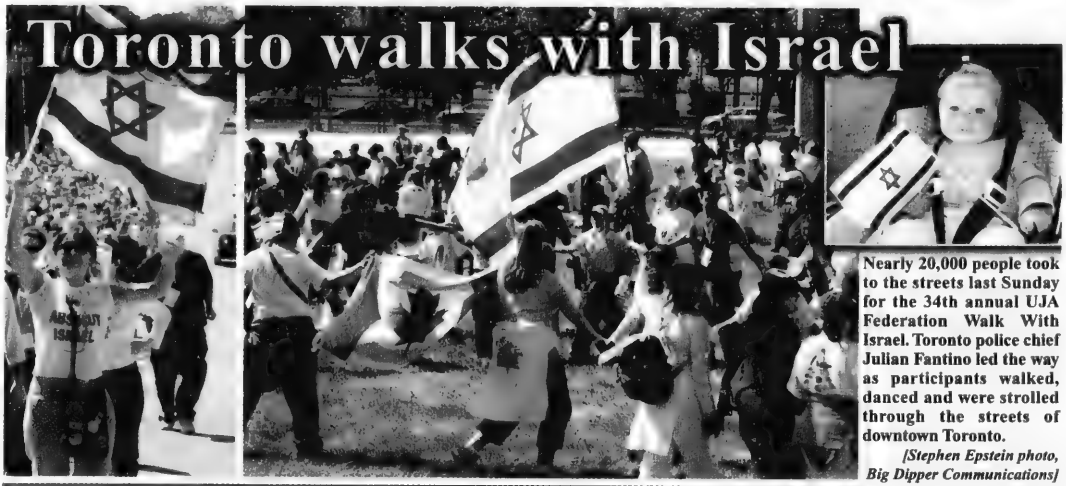
Toronto walks with Israel



Nearly 20,000 people took to the streets last Sunday for the 34th annual UJA Federation Walk With Israel. Toronto police chief Julian Fantino led the way as participants walked, danced and were strolled through the streets of downtown Toronto.

They threw themselves against Germany's Atlantic Wall

D-Day 60th Remembrance

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

About 7:45 a.m. on the morning of June 6, 1944, the ramps on landing crafts bearing the first wave of Canadian assault troops splashed down in the surf of Juno Beach in Normandy. For hundreds of young soldiers, life would from that moment be measured in terms of minutes and hours as they threw themselves against Germany's Atlantic Wall.

Freddy Harris of the Queen's Own Rifles was one of the first to hit the beach – and one of the first to die. He was only 21 years old.

Harris is remembered as someone who could hardly wait to get at the Germans who had been making the lives of his fellow Jews hell.

Barnett (Barney) Danson, his close friend and fellow veteran of the Rifles, later heard that Harris was struck down by a German bullet just as he stepped off the landing craft. Altogether, 340 Canadian soldiers would lose their lives on D-Day, while another 574 were wounded and 47 were taken prisoner. In the days to follow, 18 Canadian prisoners would be summarily executed at the Abbey of Ardenne by the 12th SS (Hitler Youth Division) under the command of Kurt Meyer.

Danson, who would go on to serve as Canada's minister of defence, recalls Freddy Harris from the prewar years, growing up together in Toronto and attending classes at Holy Blossom Temple. His nickname was "guts" and he was a gung-ho sort of guy, Danson recalled. Harris was the first of three very close army buddies who lost their lives in France.

Harris had been transferred to the fighting ahead of the others and Danson did not see action until a few days later. They, along with their close friends Gerry Rayner (a Brit who enlisted in the Canadian Army) and Earl Stoll were part of a large contingent of Jewish boys who were serving in various Canadian units during World War II. Altogether, it is estimated that 10 per cent of the country's Jewish population at the time – more than any other ethnic group – wore their country's colours in the fight against the Nazis.

One Family helps victims of terror

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Representatives of One Family were here recently to raise awareness about the organization that helps survivors of terrrorism. [Carolyn Blackman photo]

Despite being seriously injured last year in a suicide bombing at a shopping mall in Afula, Sigal Nevah, 26, says she wouldn't live anywhere else.

After spending 1½ months in hospital, and facing the prospect of surgery and physiotherapy, she acknowledges that things have been difficult, "but I love the country. My family is there, and I can't think of anywhere else to go."

Nevah was here recently as a representative of One Family, Israel Emergency Solidarity Fund, an organization that helps survivors of terrorism rebuild their lives through financial, legal, emotional and psychological assistance.

The News in Brief will return next week

She says that emotional wounds are harder to heal than physical wounds. "I always take [that moment] with me. It's not easy to go about my business, but One Family gives me hope. They came that first day, and they kept coming and kept calling; they never left me alone."

The international director of One Family, Avihu Cohen, 26, started the three-year-old organization with Marc Belzberg, who moved to Israel from Vancouver 12 years ago.

Belzberg's son was scheduled to have a bar mitzvah party shortly after the Sbarro Pizza bombing. The family cancelled the party and decided to donate all the gifts to victims of terror.

"They could not find an organization to donate it to, so we started one," says Cohen, whose father was murdered in a terrorist ambush about three years ago.

"Our goal is to let victims of terror know they are being loved and taken care of. We try our best to bring them back on track."

He travelled here with several volunteers – they also visited San Diego, Los Angeles, Denver, Detroit, Chicago and Montreal – to raise awareness about One Family, and to have people understand what is going on in Israel.

While in Toronto, they visited students at Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) and United Synagogue Day School.

"I want people to see that we are continuing on with our lives. There is a different reality in Israel but people are not desperate. They live there by choice," says Cohen.

Omer Keat, who lost a 16-year-old son to cancer 11 years ago and another son in a terrorist attack three years ago, says "We wouldn't live anywhere else. This is my home, my country, my army."

After their second tragedy, his wife was suicidal, he says, "but One Family was there. We felt a little bit better knowing that people were thinking about us. Every time we needed someone to talk to we knew where to turn."

Eventually, he said, they coaxed his wife to volunteer for the organization, "and that is when she got her life back. She volunteers almost every day, and she has the sparkle back in her eyes."

Cohen said that although the organization needs money, there are other ways people in the Diaspora can help out.

"People here can speak on behalf of Israel. They can spread the word that victims do not only feel fear, anguish and tears. They also feel hope."

Peace, coexistence inevitable: Palestinian academic

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The ground is burning under Sari Nusseibeh's feet, but against all odds, the silver-haired Palestinian academic hurtles forward in pursuit of an elusive goal – peace.

Though the Oslo peace process is dead and buried, and Israel and the Palestinians are locked in an ever deadly embrace, he glimpses a ray of light at the end of the long, murky tunnel.

"Behind the tragic landscape and the atmosphere of anger, animosity and extremism, there exists, nevertheless, a latent recognition of what the terms of a settlement must be and a recognition that this would be in the best interests of everyone concerned," he said in a recent interview. "Peace and coexistence are inevitable."

Arriving in Toronto on a sombre day when 10 Palestinians were killed while protesting Israel's biggest incursion into the Gaza Strip in years, Nusseibeh was here to promote The People's Voice initiative.

Publicly launched a year ago this month by himself and Ami Ayalon, a former director of the Shin Bet intelligence agency, The People's Voice aims at whipping up public support for a permanent peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians.

Their proposal hinges on the yet-to-be-proved assumption that if ordinary Israelis and Palestinians sign their petition, they can persuade their respective governments to resume peace talks after almost four years of strife and bloodshed in the second intifadah.

So far, 180,000 Israelis and 140,000 Palestinians have affixed their signatures to their end-of-conflict plan.

Sari Nusseibeh

It calls for a two-state solution based on the pre-1967 border, territorial swaps, a resolution of the refugee problem through the patriation of Palestinians to a demilitarized Palestinian state and the sharing of Jerusalem.

"If both leaders were to go in this direction, they would find support for our initiative," said Nusseibeh earnestly.

The 54-year-old scion of a distinguished Palestinian family, he is a Harvard and Oxford-trained philosopher, the president of Al Quds University in eastern Jerusalem, the former Palestinian Authority representative in Jerusalem and the son of a former Jordanian defence minister.

Recently, Israeli police detained Nusseibeh for four hours for illegally employing Palestinian workers from the West Bank at his university. "It may have been a technical fault," he said, implicitly admitting he may have infringed Israeli regulations. "But they could have rectified the problem in less than four hours," he added ruefully.

Nervously fingering purple prayer beads as he spoke, and casually clad in a white pin-stripped shirt, fading blue jeans and a navy blazer, Nusseibeh, a world-weary figure exuding fatigue, described the initiative as "revolutionary and unprecedented."

"We will continue to work on the signature campaign. It is a device to create public pressure on the leaders," he went on to add.

Told that 320,000 signatures pale into insignificance when compared to the approximately nine million Israelis and Palestinians living between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea, he countered, "It's not a question of numbers."

Election reflections

In just over three weeks, Canadians will be voting for a new federal government. It is appropriate, therefore, that we record, again, the parameters of The CJN's coverage for the upcoming election.

Excluding this edition, there will be three issues of The CJN prior to the actual election on Monday, June 28. Due to the intervention of the Shavuot holiday last week, we were unable to provide a news story on the election in this issue. As an anomalous result of our production schedule, the edition of July 1 will not contain any election coverage because we will be going to press Monday morning, the very day of the election itself. Unless any conclusions about the election results are by then so forgone, it is not likely that the July 1 issue will contain any coverage of the campaign.

The paucity of editions prior to the election places a great deal of pressure on the editorial department.

We cannot, nor would we, highlight candidates merely because they happen to be Jewish. Rather, we prefer to try to highlight the ridings across the country where Jews comprise a significant proportion of the electorate. In those instances, we will provide a thumbnail sketch of the riding: the demographics, local issues and the candidates vying for our voter loyalty.

The CJN endorses no leader, nor any party. We will however try to publish an interview with each of the major party leaders. Requests for such interviews have already gone out, and we await the leaders' responses.

While The CJN endorses no party, we do however endorse, encourage and urge the free and reasoned exercise by each voter of his or her franchise according to criteria that are consistent with each individual's conscience.

But, the conscience is a subjective calculus. It strops itself into a sharp, cutting edge against private, leathery notions of the proper role of government in a democracy.

The CJN, of course, can only suggest a broad guideline for such criteria: good governance.

In matters of domestic policy, good governance should be consistent with objectives of social responsibility, economic security and achieving the maximum good for the widest number of people possible.

In matters of foreign policy, good governance should be consistent with and supportive of the core values of Canadian democracy. This, in turn, should translate into reliably unflagging – though not unquestioning – support of Israel, a fellow democracy, in its existential struggle against the non-democratic tyrants, despots, military strongmen and theocratic thugs determined to bring about its demise. It should also translate into the wholehearted participation in the fight against international terrorism, which is anathema to freedom and democracy.

These are the minimum criteria, admittedly defined very broadly, that are appropriate for CJN readers to apply when considering for whom to vote in the upcoming federal election.

* * *

In keeping with our policy of not endorsing any of the parties, we seldom comment on the specifics of a particular leader's campaign.

Occasionally, but only rarely so, there are exceptions to this rule when we feel compelled to respond to an incident or event in an election campaign.

Though it was merely the first week of the campaign, the accusation by Jack Layton that Paul Martin, as finance minister, was personally responsible for the deaths of homeless individuals is too egregious a behaviour to ignore. It went far beyond campaign rhetoric into dangerous calumny.

"I believe that when Paul Martin cancelled affordable housing [programs] across this country, it produced a dramatic rise in homelessness and death due to homelessness, and I have always said that I hold him personally responsible for that," Layton told a partisan audience last week.

Three weeks ago, when the calling of a federal election became a certainty, The CJN urged party leaders to "avoid... the particularly odious, ad hominem method of negative campaigning... We expect our politicians to campaign hard, but we demand that they not degrade each other... through personal vilification."

Could there be a worse example of personal vilification than that exhibited by Layton against Martin?

Not only was it a vicious, incendiary attack, and thus outside the boundary of appropriate campaign behaviour, it was at the same time, as many commentators have pointed out, substantively incorrect.

"To blame Mr. Martin personally for the deaths of homeless people," wrote Andrew Coyne in the National Post, "is to gloss over any number of intermediate steps, whether of causality or intent."

Coyne was making the very obvious point that an indisputable, direct causal link cannot be drawn between Martin's macro decisions as finance minister and the "micro" tragedies of the homeless' deaths. That Layton believes the opposite is alarming. That he refused to recant or apologize for his ad hominem attack is illuminating. —MBD

Group holds vigil for people with eating disorders

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

It was appropriate that the first vigil for eating disorders took place during the day.

After all, said event co-ordinator Debby Goldstein, the purpose of the vigil was to dispel "the darkness in which our children live."

More than 100 people took part in the program, held at Richmond Green in Richmond Hill and sponsored by FADE (Family and Friends Against Disordered Eating), the Hospital for Sick Children, the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, Homewood Health Centre, the National Eating Disorder Information Centre and Bellwood Health Services.

The theme of the program was "to honour, support and celebrate" – to honour those who lost the battle (eating disorders have an approximately 20 per cent mortality rate, the highest of any mental illness), to support those who are struggling and those who help them, and to celebrate those who have overcome their problem.

We must offer a continuum of care, ensuring that there is a safe place to go when the person is medically stable, make the public understand the seriousness of the situation and be vigilant with the media, who create an artificial image of beauty, Goldstein said.

Bill Coleman, president of FADE, charged that "the government has paid little attention to eating disorders or to the need for financial and other kinds of aid."

Eating disorders must be recognized as a health priority in Ontario, he said. "It is time to break the silence about a disease that thousands have and from which some will die."

Blake Woodside, director of the Inpatient Eating Disorders Program at the Toronto General Hospital, called the vigil "a day to speak from the heart, not from notes." He said his program was recently forced to close its waiting list for new patients.

"It costs $3 million to send patients to the United States for treatment. My budget is $900,000 – and is being cut."

He said families are the most important support a sufferer can have. "When you despair and want to give up hope, when there is one last ember left in you, put it away somewhere safe, so that when you need it [for your child], it will be there."

The families themselves, he said, need a network of support as they come to terms with a relentless illness for which they are not the cause and are not responsible, and which they cannot heal.

Leora Pinhas of Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children, decried the pressure put on teenagers and tweens, the selling of violence to boys and the thin ideal of beauty for girls.

A recent study, she said, showed that children of five and six have eating disorders. "That was unheard of before.

"When do we as a culture stop this? When do we stop selling out our kids?" she demanded.

Ian Boulton, a recovered anorexic, repeated Woodside's comment that "nobody is to blame and everybody is involved." He urged the participants to "go out into the world. Question the authorities, the billboards, album covers, the media, yourself."

The emotional program ended with the release of four baskets of doves as a symbol of hope. A single dove, a memorial to those who have died, was released by Carolyn Mayeur, whose daughter Danielle lost her battle.

The afternoon ended with tears and hugs between present and past sufferers of the disease, the youngsters and their parents, and the youngsters and other people's parents, recognizing the bond between all of them.

Simone Finkelstein, a recovered anorexic and now a nutritionist and counsellor specializing in eating disorders, said the vigil was not just moving, but very needed.

Her dream, one echoed by Goldstein and Coleman, is to establish an intensive residential program in a serene place in the country, staffed by a psychiatrist, medical doctor, nurse and art therapist.

In her late teens, she said, she decided to go on a "little diet." There was a lot of chaos in her life, over which she had no control. "I could control the food I ate and the numbers on the scale."

From a healthy weight of 120 pounds, she went down to 84 in three years. Her family, while supportive, couldn't really understand what she was going through. Too scared to enter a hospital program, she tried group therapy one on one therapy and residential care in Arizona, none of which worked.

She finally realized that if she wanted to get better – and she did – she had better take herself in hand.

The techniques she used to recover are those she now uses with her clients: raising self-esteem, correcting body image problems, offering nutritional counselling.

"We discuss their goals and I help them take baby steps toward those goals. They need to be able to see that they can succeed."

She said she encourages them to try new foods and figure out strategies to help them get where they want to go.

She makes her clients write three things they like about themselves every day, write letters to themselves and to their eating disorders several times, and see the differences.

"I tell them, 'Don't say that you can't do something. Say that it's a challenge.'

"If you work on the underlying issues and learn to like yourself, you won't want to self-destruct anymore.

"It's all about mindset," she said. "If you want to get better, you do – just look at me."

Finkelstein said being forced into treatments or being force fed in treatment simply doesn't work. "People have to feel comfortable and take things at their own pace."

A lot of programs, she said, treat a "typical person," rather than the individual.

Computer program helps diagnose infectious diseases

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

The computer program GIDEON is the technological "solution" for the diagnosis and treatment of infectious diseases, connecting medical professionals across the globe at the touch of a button, said Dr. Stephen Berger, director of geographic medicine and microbiology at the Tel Aviv Medical Centre.

"It's a cutting-edge computer program that has grown up with the field itself," he said recently at the third annual Jay Keystone Memorial Lecture in Toronto.

Keystone, chief of Toronto General Hospital's tropical disease unit, invited Berger to speak about GIDEON to an audience primarily of doctors.

Developed by Berger 15 years ago, GIDEON (Global Infectious Disease and Epidemiology Network) is used by hundreds of institutions in more than 40 countries, through CD-ROM and online, Berger said.

With 337 infectious diseases in 225 countries, he said, GIDEON provides quick access to a database updated weekly with the latest medical information. It uses relevant citations appearing in monthly MEDLINE searches, World Health Organization publications, meeting abstracts, user feedback, National Health Ministry reports and peer-review journals.

As a new disease is discovered every eight months on average, Berger said, textbooks are no longer reliable sources. "They're out of date before they're even published."

And because infectious diseases no longer stay in their country of origin, it is a challenge to keep track of outbreaks, he said. "Most people don't even recognize the names of many of these diseases and their drugs."

Challenge to keep track of outbreaks

An advantage of GIDEON online is that subscribers are all connected to a server that allows, for instance, "people in L.A. to see cases in China," said Berger.

Red flags go up when a suspicious disease is spreading, and "an outbreak can be identified the day it's happening," he said. "GIDEON can be used as a surveillance system this way."

GIDEON increases the speed and accuracy of the diagnosic procedure by eliminating diseases inconsistent with clinical and epidemiological presentation and identifying diseases requiring isolation or infection control measures, he said.

With 240 diagnostic tools in the program, GIDEON provides a ranked differential diagnosis that takes into account patient symptoms, the country of acquisition, the incubation period, laboratory test results, immune status and bio-terrorism, Berger said.

GIDEON also gives a percentage probability of each listed disease diagnosis and explains why certain diseases have not been included as possibilities, he added.

Detailed information on each disease and drug can be accessed, and two or more diseases can be compared in terms of their clinical and laboratory features, Berger said.

Custom notes can be entered at the bottom of the page for users to add personal or institutional comments.

A filter tool is available as well, to narrow down search results, he said. For example, if a patient has a fever and was bitten by a tick in India, the known details can assist in generating a more immediate diagnosis.

In GIDEON's therapy section, a complete list of drugs for treatment of infection appear, and the program's drug of choice is suggested. Drug, disease and bacteria synonyms are offered, as it is impossible to know, for example, all 439 trade names for Amoxicillin, Berger said.

Warnings about drug side-effects, adult and pediatric dosages, and mechanism of action are also available, he said.

GIDEON can even save patients money by minimizing and pinpointing which laboratory test(s) should be performed on them.

While there is an Internet fee for GIDEON usage, Berger said a free one-month trial subscription can be ordered. He said every three months a new CD version of GIDEON is on the market.

Microsoft Windows 95, 98, ME, NT, 2000 and XP can support the CD, and the program can be found online at www.GIDEONonline.com.

Subscribers include hospitals, medical libraries and schools, private practitioners, health departments and government and travel clinics.

Zareinu Moveathon is 'a special event for special children'

Zareinu Educational Centre of Metropolitan Toronto, a day school and treatment centre for children with physical and developmental disabilities, will host its seventh annual Zareinu Moveathon on Sunday, June 13, at Earl Bales Park.

The full-day fundraiser will feature 50-km and 100-km bike rides, a 20-km family ride, a 10-km run, and a 2-km Family Fun Loop, all followed by a giant community picnic and carnival.

The highlight of the day will be at 2:30 p.m., when 100-km and 50-km riders return under police-escort to be greeted by cheering crowds. All sporting events will start and end at Earl Bales Park, on Bathurst Street south of Sheppard Avenue.

Proceeds from the Zareinu Moveathon, which draws more than 4,000 people every year, will go to Zareinu's children and their families. The school, located in Thornhill, provides special education and individualized therapies to children with physical and developmental challenges.

"The Zareinu Moveathon lets people from all backgrounds come together as a group to take part in a truly special event for special children," said event chair Hershy Weinberg.

"This year, the response from individuals, schools, community groups and corporate sponsors has been overwhelming. Through their participation and generosity, Zareinu's children and families can continue to receive costly and intensive therapies and programs that enrich their lives."

Returning this year is the Clergy on the Move campaign. More than a dozen synagogues are building teams led by their respective rabbis or cantors to walk, jog or run the 10-km circuit, or cycle the 20-km circuit on patrolled city streets.

The picnic and carnival feature live entertainment, including the All Star Skateboard Circus, a Wushu martial arts demonstration, strolling lion dancers, and jugglers, as well as vendors selling food and drinks.

At the Zareinu Information Centre, a team of Zareinu therapists will run visitors through a series of exercises to show some of the daily challenges faced by children with disabilities.

For more information about the Zareinu Moveathon, or to sign up for an event, visit www.moveathon.com or call 416-661-1800.

Arab world mistaken about Israel: U.S. historian

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Arabs have misinterpreted Israeli restraint and flexibility for weakness, says conservative American military historian, author and media commentator Victor Davis Hanson.

Delivering the Lawrence and Frances Bloomberg lecture at Holy Blossom Temple last week, he cited three examples to illustrate his point.

During the first Gulf War, Israel did not hit back after being struck by 39 Iraqi Scud missiles that caused widspread property damage.

In May 2000, Israel withdrew from southern Lebanon unilaterally.

And several months later, at the Camp David summit, Israel offered the Palestinians an end-of-conflict agreement they rejected.

> Misinterpreted restraint and flexibility for weakness

Yet in the Arab world, Israel's moves were generally regarded as a symptom of weakness.

Describing the Jewish state as a bastion of Western democratic values that should be supported by the West, Hanson praised Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's proposal to withdraw from the Gaza Strip as strategically brilliant.

Once Israel pulls out, the onus will be on the Palestinians to make a "utopia" in Gaza, and the world will be watching.

Expressing admiration for what he called Sharon's courage, Hanson said he was elected to restore Israel's military deterrence.

Hanson, whose articles have appeared in publications such as The Wall Street Journal and The National Review, noted that the Arab world has lost the means to wage conventional war on Israel.

The present struggle between Israel and the Palestinians is not only about "occupied areas." Not elaborating, he left the impression that the Palestinians covet more than just the West Bank and Gaza.

Hanson, who shot from obscurity after the Sept. 11, 2001 terrorist attacks in the United States, urged the West to defeat the forces of Islamic radicalism.

"Let's not underestimate the power of resolute action," declared Hanson, the author of Carnage and Culture.

In his view, the goal of Islamic radicals is to reshape the universe according to a medieval template.

Since they lack conventional armies, they resort to terrorism, he said.

Hanson wondered why Arab terrorists had, in fact, attacked the United States on Sept. 11.

Had not America come to the rescue of Muslims in the Balkans and Somalia and liberated Kuwait from Iraqi aggression? War, therefore, is not necessarily a bad thing.

Hanson, a Californian who did not meet a Jew until he was 18, said that Muslim attacks against Western targets and Jews deflect attention away from the failings of Muslim societies.

Sounding an upbeat note about Iraq, Hanson predicted the United States will win the current guerrilla war there decisively.

"If we win, we'll have more allies than we know what to do with."

In a truculent aside, he said that U.S. marines should have conquered the rebellious Sunni Triangle town of Falluja rather than handing it over to a former Iraqi general for pacification.

Two Toronto high school students win Emunah scholarships to study in Israel

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Emunah Women of Toronto has awarded scholarships to high school students Ariella Pratzer and Shira Sokol to study in Israel for one year.

Pratzer, a student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, received the Louis Manpel Scholarship. She will be attending Midreshet Lindenbaum in Jerusalem next fall.

Sokol received the Judith Rubinstein Scholarship and will be studying at Michlelet Orot in Petach Tikvah. She is currently a student at Ulpanat Orot Girls' School.

Every year, Emunah Women of Toronto sends applications to CHAT, Ulpanat Orot and Tiferes Bais Yaakov seeking female students who have decided to study at an Orthodox Zionist seminary in Israel.

This year, they received 17 applications. A committee of six women narrowed down the applicants to four and then chose two, Pratzer and Sokol.

Janice Freedman, office administrator for Emunah Women of Toronto, said both Pratzer and Sokol are outgoing,girls with high leadership skills. She said they are involved in many extra-curricular activities, including UJA telethons, committees, student council, helping children and chairing events.

To apply for the scholarships, Pratzer and Sokol had to write a 500- to 700-word essay about where they see themselves in 10 years; what their personal, academic and community goals are; and how a year in Israel would help them achieve these goals.

Then they each had an interview with the committee.

"The people on the committee spoke so highly of them," said Freedman.

A debt that only God can repay

"Stiff resistance" was the term commanders frequently used when reporting the forward progress of their troops against the German enemy on that gray, hazy June morning 60 years ago. But like most summary attempts to convey a massive, indescribable reality in a mere registrar's phrase, the terminology was hopelessly inadequate and excessively antiseptic.

In truth, the D-Day landing by Allied fighting forces on the 60-mile arc of beach in Normandy, France, on June 6, 1944, the largest amphibious military assault in history, was gut-wrenching chaos.

More than 150,000 soldiers from the combined Allied forces of the United States, Britain and Canada stormed ashore in the early hours of June 6 from an armada of some 5,000 ships, to begin the liberation of western Europe from its Nazi conquerors. As CJN reporter Paul Lungen writes in this issue, "Altogether, 340 Canadian soldiers would lose their lives on D-Day, another 574 were wounded and 47 were taken prisoner… By June 11, 1,017 Canadians had been killed in action and 1,814 wounded… By late August, more than 5,021 [were] dead." By nightfall, some 10,000 Allied soldiers would become casualties to that "stiff resistance," and yet the liberating forces would secure the beaches whose names – Omaha, Utah (by Americans), Juno (by Canadians), Sword and Gold (by the British) – would enter the pages of modern history along with the date on which the sand of those beaches would be drenched in so much blood.

Martin Gilbert records that in her diary entry on June 6, 1944, Anne Frank wrote from her hiding place in Amsterdam: "Could we be granted victory this year, 1944? We don't know yet, but hope is revived within me; it give us fresh courage and makes us strong again."

The D-Day landing was a beacon of radiating courage and hope for all the conquered and victimized peoples of Europe, though scores of thousands more were still destined to die in the war. Indeed, Hanna Senesh, a young Palestinian Jew from Kibbutz Sdot Yam whom the British had parachuted behind German lines into eastern Europe, was captured on D-Day and eventually murdered by her captors.

Once they landed, however, the advance of the Allied forces against the armies of Adolf Hitler was inexorable. Though they bled so terribly, the soldiers of democracy were unstoppable. On Aug. 25, American troops entered Paris.

Eleven months and two days after the Allied forces landed on the beaches of Normandy – May 8, 1945 – the war in Europe came to an end. The systematic killing of the Jews of Europe by the Nazis and their collaborators also stopped.

Many soldiers lost their lives on D-Day, as did many thousands more in the ensuing months. The early ending of their lives is a debt we, the succeeding generations, will always owe to those brave men and women.

But it is a debt that only God in heaven can repay.

Focus on the Family (1)

We were appalled to see a half-page ad sponsored by Focus on the Family opposing same-sex marriage in the CJN's May 20 edition. Although the purported goal of this ad is the promotion of healthy, wholesome families, the underlying attitude of Focus on the Family and like-minded groups towards gays and lesbians is consistently one of disgust and fear.

Furthermore, Focus on the Family is an American right-wing, fundamentalist Christian organization. While we recognize that some members of the Jewish community may sympathize with its dismissal of the marriage rights of gays and lesbians, these individuals would be well-advised to choose their bedfellows carefully. Among the "Christian values" that fundamentalists espouse is a belief that the Jews must convert prior to the Second Coming. These people are not our allies and we should not be providing a voice for them in our publications.

Focus on the Family (2)

I cannot believe The CJN would run an advertisement from Focus on the Family, which basically states that same-sex marriages will ruin society and are harmful to children. The ad, which shows (curiously) a very white, very blond couple and child, is intended to discredit and dehumanize gay and lesbian relationships and alternative families. Why would The CJN wish to profit financially from advertising that so blatantly promotes intolerance, inequality and barely concealed hatred?

Objects to Landy's opinion

Once again, I find myself wondering whether the Canadian Jewish Congress considers its constituency to be Canadian Jews or the Liberal Party of Canada.

In "Three new leaders will take their case to the people" (CJN, May 28), CJC president Keith Landy praises Paul Martin to the heavens, while dismissing Conservative leader Stephen Harper as having "much to learn" about foreign affairs.

Landy says CJC has "great expectations of change with respect to Israel" if Martin is re-elected. Excuse me? Martin has been a top cabinet minister for more than a decade and has governed as prime minister for six months. How long will we naively keep voting Liberal and hoping for change?

Since Martin took over as prime minister, his foreign minister, Bill Graham – the same man who for months refused to add Hezbollah to Canada's list of terrorist groups – has condemned Israel's targeted assassination of Hamas murderer Ahmed Yassin; his Liberal MP Pat O'Brien has compared Israel's anti-terror fence to "concentration camps;" his government vetoed a Conservative motion to keep a notorious anti-Semitic cleric out of the country; and his immigration minister allowed the Khadr family – friends and cohorts of Al Qaeda leader Osama Bin Laden – back into Canada. Meanwhile, his provincial cousins in Ontario retroactively repealed the religious school tax credits, thus ensuring that racial discrimination is institutionalized into law.

Does that sound like a "true friend of the community"?

In contrast, Stephen Harper has appointed Stockwell Day, one of Israel's strongest advocates, as his foreign affairs critic. The Conservatives led the campaign to ban Hamas and Hezbollah in Canada. It was Conservative MPs who rose to defend Israel after O'Brien's scathing criticisms. It was a Conservative senator who rose to defend Israel's right to self defence after the Yassin assassination. It was a Conservative who tried to have infamous Saudi hatemonger Sheik Abd Al-Sudais barred from entering Canada.

Yet, if you believe the CJC, it is Harper who has much to learn and Paul Martin who is our community's saviour. Such comments are misleading and deplorable.

Candidate omitted from story

I was shocked and outraged at your omission from your election coverage of Conservative candidate Michael Mostyn, who is running in the York Centre riding ("Three new leaders will take their case to the people," CJN, May 28). You mentioned other Jewish candidates, but for some reason omitted Mostyn.

I am a 24-year-old resident of the riding and I have been working with Mostyn on his campaign. I have never met a more honest and sincere person who has all the qualities that the Jewish community could want to represent them in Ottawa. Your paper often criticizes the Liberals for their foreign policy towards Israel and here is a candidate who has nothing but support for Israel and our Jewish community, yet you gave him no mention whatsoever.

The Jewish community should not be afraid to support another party besides the Liberals, especially when we have the opportunity to send someone from our own community to stand up for us.

Calls for NDP vote

Considering how many Jewish Canadians identify as progressives or socialists, and the historical link between Jews and the left, it is surprising and disrespectful that The CJN chose not to even mention the NDP in its election feature in the May 28 issue. It seems to me that the bulk of the Toronto Jewish community would be most at home in the New Democratic Party.

We Ontarians who consider ourselves "liberal" should remember an old aphorism, inspired by the folksinger Phil Ochs, who lampooned liberals who "loved Puerto Ricans and Negroes" and "felt like I'm almost a Jew." Liberals govern like conservatives. One only needs to look at Dalton McGuinty. True small "l" liberals should vote NDP.

Thinking more seriously about Jewish education

The following is Part 2 of a two-part essay on Jewish education. Part 1 was published in last week's CJN.

By DANIEL MAROM

While Judaism offers a rich treasure of wisdom and ideas, a long and dramatic history that profoundly influenced other religions, cultures and peoples, and an ennobling heritage, our programs and institutions of Jewish education often seem bound up with narrow issues and concerns. How can this gap be overcome?

In Part 1 of this article, I reported on the Mandel Foundation's efforts to address this problem. Its decade-long project involved working closely with leading Jewish scholars, educators and researchers to develop alternative conceptions of a meaningful and compelling Jewish education. Seymour Fox and I led the project in collaboration with Harvard University's Philosophy of Education Research Center, and its director at the time, Israel Scheffler.

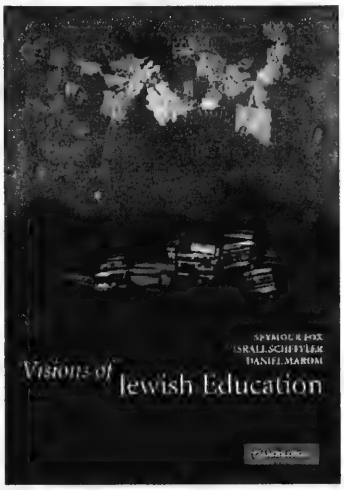
The results of this work have recently been published in a volume titled Visions of Jewish Education (Cambridge University Press, 2003), which offers those engaged in Jewish education – educators, policymakers, Judaic scholars, researchers or parents – six visions of Jewish education as a point of reference for thinking more seriously about their own commitments and practices.

For Isadore Twersky, the late director of the centre for Jewish studies at Harvard University and a leading authority on Maimonides, the educated Jew is a master at applying the theological, moral and historical principles contained in halachic literature to the minutiae of every day life. Twersky shows how each situation encountered by such a person – even deciding where to sit on a bus – would be treated as an opportunity to do something religiously and ethically significant.

On the other hand, Menachem Brinker, an Israeli secularist at the Hebrew University and the University of Chicago, seeks to liberate Jewish education from the assumption that a good Jew is someone who adheres to any particular axiom of faith or code of behaviour. For Brinker, a scholar of early Zionist thought, the ideal graduate of Jewish education is a freethinking person who is deeply involved with the Jewish community, thoroughly proficient in its history, literature and ideas, and committed to activities aimed at the betterment of Jewish life.

Moshe Greenberg, a Bible scholar at the Hebrew University, posits a view of Jewish education that focuses on addressing the spiritual needs of Jewish learners without requiring them to adopt any prior assumptions about the validity or supremacy of Jewish religion. Through continuous engagement with Jewish texts and participation in the tradition of their commentary, Greenberg's learner seeks out answers to the question, "What is of lasting worth?" and tries to live in accordance with those answers.

Michael Meyer, a historian of modern Judaism at Hebrew Union College, suggests that various lessons from the past two centuries of Reform Judaism can be a means to strengthen its impact in the future. Meyer's educated Reform Jew is one whose autonomous relationship to Judaism has been developed and refined over time rather than assumed from the outset. As well, the Jewish identity of this person will not rest solely on theological commitments, but will also be bolstered by ethnic awareness.



Michael Rosenak, a philosopher of Jewish education at the Hebrew University, presents a set of challenges to all visions of Jewish education. Over and above his own modern Orthodox commitments, Rosenak turns to the community as a whole to ask: How will Jews educated in accordance with one vision come to have a common basis with Jews educated in accordance with others? How will the educated Jews of various kinds learn to co-operate in solving problems that challenge their coexistence?

And finally, Israel Scheffler, a philosopher of education and consultant to the Visions project, explores topics and issues in general education and suggests their contribution to envisioning Jewish education. Scheffler's educated Jew is a person whose Jewish learning is coherent with the values that guide his or her learning in general.

Although the scholars developed their conceptions in dialogue with one another and with leading Jewish educators, social scientists, rabbis, policymakers and federation planners, we did not assume that their work alone could make an impact. Working conditions in institutions of Jewish education do not allow enough time for the kind of thinking that is necessary to redefine the aims and methods of Jewish education. How, then, could such ideas become part of the living culture and workplace of Jewish life?

The last section of Visions of Jewish Education, titled "Visions in Context," suggest ways a philosophical educational orientation can become part of the way Jewish education is devised and implemented.

First, Seymour Fox illustrates how educators, administrators, policymakers and others might improve their work through such an orientation, using the six visions as examples. He describes what early childhood programs based on Twersky's or Meyer's proposals might look like, the co-operation of formal and informal programs of education in a Greenbergian system, the questions a teacher would ask students about text and how a principal would run her or his school according to Brinker's conception, and how all the visions might be useful to policymakers in making their decisions.

The final chapter describes an experiment in which I acted as an on-site educational philosopher at a non-denominational day school in North America. I write about my work with this school during the school's process of reformulating its purposes and practices. I describe principles that guided my work and offer a series of vignettes that tell about how I applied them in the everyday life of the school. My hope is that this chapter might offer a basis upon which to generate similar initiatives.

The publication of Visions has led to an ongoing Visions of Jewish Education Project (VJEP), which I direct. The aim of our project is to enable those engaged in Jewish education to frame their guiding ideas and corresponding methods in light of the profound ideas of Judaism and Jewish existence. The VJEP serves Jewish education in Israel and communities around the world through seminars, collaborative initiatives, demonstration sites, an online resource centre and publications (www.mandelfoundation.org/vjep.asp).

A powerful example emerged from a recent seminar for the professional development of teachers, in which we studied Twersky's vision and its pedagogical implications. Since Twersky's vision posited the teaching of each and every mitzvah as an opportunity for character education, we decided to explore the possibilities embedded in the Jewish law of hashavat aveydah, returning lost property.

We chose this particular law because we sensed that it provides a microcosm for the beauty and power of Halachah. The renowned Jewish historian Gerson Cohen once claimed that the uniqueness of Judaism in western civilization is expressed well in the difference between the common principle of "finders keepers losers weepers" and the Jewish obligation to seek out the owner of a lost item until it is properly returned. According to Jewish law, one who does not undertake this obligation in effect becomes a thief.

Following Twersky's approach, we first delved into the philosophical ideas behind this law, studied the details of its observance and then focused on the linkage between the two aspects involved in actually carrying out the mitzvah. Only after we had concluded this unit of study, did we begin to think creatively about how the deeper meaning and full experience of this Jewish practice could be effectively transmitted to learners. This study process became a model as well for how teachers in schools might learn together – one that I would argue would be hard to find in existing programs of Jewish education.

One interesting suggestion that emerged was the possibility of replacing a school's lost and found with a hashavat aveydah station. Participants emphasized that this station ought not to be a place where the learner simply returns the lost item and lets somebody else take responsibility for giving it back to the owner.

"That might be appropriate and practical at the community level," they argued, "but here the whole point is for us to enable the learner to experience the practice of the Jewish law in a way that he or she will internalize the value of respect for ownership and commitment to building a just and caring society. Only through such experiences can we hope to cultivate a just Jewish community."

Thus, a student who found a lost item would be encouraged to bring it to the station, where he or she would be greeted by a teacher who would use his or her proficiency with the law to individually "coach" the student in carrying out the obligation to return the item.

If the student was at a loss about ways of finding the owner, the teacher would posit the suggestions found in halachic literature.

If, after several failed attempts using this literature, the learner expressed frustration and impatience with the purpose and tenor of this law – claiming that if the owner lost the item, "it's their tough luck" – the Jewish educator would philosophically challenge him or her with ideas behind hashavat aveydah: "I see that you would prefer to live among people who are indifferent to each other's belongings over having to persist in finding the owner of this lost property… But isn't there a huge price to pay for that? Wouldn't you prefer to know that when you lost something valuable to you, someone else cared enough about it to make an effort to return it to you even without personally knowing you?… That is what this law is about and this is the kind of society we are trying to build in our school and our community."

Whatever discussion might follow this challenge, it would enable both the "coach" and the learner to engage in a profound pedagogical exchange – one that is both uniquely Jewish and sorely lacking in other educational systems.

At the end of the discussion, a participant rose and angrily cried out, "My children have been getting a Jewish education for years and have received little experience of this kind. How can it be that Judaism offers such beautiful and compelling educational opportunities and they have never successfully been transmitted to my children?"

If this is what she got from looking at one example of one conception, imagine what might emerge if all the educators, administrators, policymakers, parents and others were to explore whole visions of Jewish education on an ongoing basis.

Daniel Marom is director of Visions of Jewish Education at the Mandel Foundation in Jerusalem. He is a graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and the York University program in Jewish education.

Opinions

Social activism reflects Jewish values

Though rabbis and synagogues often join in local interfaith social projects, Jewish participation in such programs on the provincial and national level is less consistent. Though individual Jews are often committed social justice activists, they rarely represent the Jewish community.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

My own experience bears this out. For many years, I have been involved with the Interfaith Social Assistance Reform Coalition (ISARC) in Ontario. Of the two Jewish organizations listed among its sponsors, only one has been visible. Others that should have participated have stayed away.

Yet ISARC reflects Jewish values and addresses problems Jewish social agencies share. It seeks to influence legislators to ease the intolerable burden placed on charities that try to bridge the social gap. It calls for increased government resources for justice for the poor, the homeless and the disabled, thus securing for them a dignified existence. The fact so many people in Canada, including children, live below the poverty line is a scandal, especially in view of the country's wealth and the prosperity of many of its inhabitants.

ISARC's most recent project has been the social audit it conducted in Ontario. The findings have now been published in a powerful document, Lives in the Balance (can be purchased through www.pandorapress.com for $19.95). The book brings compelling evidence of the terrible inequalities in our society. It points to realistic and inexpensive ways to remedy many of them. However, those in power are only likely to act on its recommendations if their constituents urge them to do so. Our complacency will be their excuse for not doing enough.

Jews are important in many ridings. Here is our opportunity to make our voices heard on behalf of the community at large, as well as the needy in our own midst. In addition to information, Lives in the Balance provides the inspiration for action in all provinces.

Jews are rightfully an integral part of Canadian society. Though we are aware of the benefits, we don't always seem to accept the obligations of integration. As the heirs of the biblical prophets' passion for justice, we have a duty to articulate their vision in the service of all our fellow-citizens – and act on it.

In my contribution to Lives in the Balance I cited the prophet Ezekiel. He identifies arrogance as the sin of Sodom: "She and her daughters had plenty of bread and untroubled tranquility; yet she did not support the poor and needy" (16:49). As Pirkei Avot (5:13) suggests, the one who says, "What is mine is mine and what is yours is yours" speaks the language of Sodom. It behooves us to speak differently – and be heard.

How do we make our choices?

The end of final exams this year has marked the end of an era for me.

The last bubble has been dutifully filled in on the multiple-choice sheet. The mechanical pencil has been refilled with lead for the last time, put down squarely on the edge of the desk as the buzzer goes off to indicate the end of the exam.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

For the last time, I have walked through the stuffy hallways, sat in sparse classrooms named after sponsoring oil companies, and listened to professors drone on and on.

And on.

It is now time to set out into the real world, say others around me by way of congratulations – and oh, what a shock to be told that what you've been living in for the last four, five or six years of post-secondary education doesn't qualify as being real.

So far I'm not impressed.

Blame it, perhaps, on what pop psychologists like to refer to as the "quarter-life crisis." Whatever it is, it's definitely here and it continues to rage on.

I think my first clue was when I started to look longingly at 40-year-old celebrities who talk about how glad they are to have survived their 20s and how fabulous life is now that it's behind them and they everything All Figured Out.

I've never heard a better endorsement for being 40 in my life. Sign me up now, please.

Anything to avoid day after day of the greatest internal inquisition I have ever known.

"Is this is what life is all about? What is my purpose? Am I doing the right thing? Should I go back to school? Should I take on that job? What do I really want to do?"

But most tellingly of all, "Why can't I be more grateful for everything I have?"

After I crossed the stage at graduation, all decked out in that ridiculous cap that doesn't stay on your head and that non-form-fitting gown, just to get my pieces of paper, I couldn't help but think: "There's got to be more to it than this."

And I still don't understand why people expect me to be so thrilled at the offer of a $30,000-a-year job when I just finished paying for a $40,000 education and completed two degrees.

Yet I've learned the hard way that taking on a job you hate just because of the money is the hardest way to save any of it. Because the more unhappy you are, the more money you spend to make yourself happy again.

One of my favorite authors, Yann Martel, describes a tie as nothing but an inverted noose, and I can't help but wonder if perhaps he is right.

Clearly he has never discovered the horrors of pantyhose, which in my mind are far worse. But I digress.

I looked at my goals for the next 10 years and they were all pretty lofty.

They include the completion of at least my master's degree, if not my PhD as well; publishing a book; dabbling in the medium of film, whether as a screenwriter or behind the camera; and travelling across Asia and Europe.

These goals seem so implausible, so very far away right now. After all, I have not only sold my soul to a job in the energy industry that most other people would give their eyeteeth for, but I have also acquired a new sofa for my apartment.

How can I leave behind my well-paying job, my apartment whose balcony doesn't look out into a dumpster but rather onto the street – the privilege for which I pay good money – and my new sofa to become a starving student again?

On the one hand, I want to be as far removed as possible from the poverty of my early childhood and always have enough to afford the pretty, shiny things in life. On the other, it would seem as if a certain amount of dreaming, and of youthful idealism, must be sacrificed for it.

I wish I knew what to choose.

It's not reality, but it's still addictive

Jesse picked Jessica. For those of you who don't watch The Bachelor, this translates to: the latest bachelor, Jesse Palmer, an NFL quarterback for the New York Giants, selected Jessica B., a law student from California, rather than Tara, the construction worker from Oklahoma, to be his life partner. Now admittedly, this factoid is of little relevance to anyone other than a reality TV die-hard, and yet, it was the most significant occurrence of my day.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

I should mention that Jasmine Trias also got booted from American Idol, but we all knew it had to happen, so it definitely came as less of a shock, and thus did not have the excitement of the bachelor's final choice.

Family and friends declare my obsession to be shameful. I, of course, don't even attempt to justify my fascination with reality TV as a meritorious one. Admittedly, I am myself embarrassed to admit my dependence. But, whereas once I could deny an obsession, this season, my devout following of The Bachelor, Survivor All-Stars, American Idol, Trading Spaces: Home Free and Extreme Makeover Home Edition, in addition to the excitement of returning old favourites Big Brother and The Amazing Race, I can no longer rationally do so.

So why is it that I, who can appreciate things like classical music, opera, well written plays, classic literature, and the more respectable television dramas like The West Wing, also have this incorrigible need for reality TV?

Don't think I haven't given this thought. I realize how ridiculous the reality TV genre is. I accept its barely veiled emotional manipulation, the massacre-esque editing that re-hashes the one-liners to draw you in. I see in all of these shows the silly and puerile tactics that make them popular, and yet I love them. Not only do I watch them on TV, but now, thanks to the Internet, I get the extra "behind the scenes" information between episodes. My interest has become a full-scale dependence.

Perhaps reality TV provides a much-needed escape. Everything in life today seems serious, planned and formal. Reality TV provides just the opposite, and as stupid as it may seem, it is a nice escape to watch two people madly fall in love, even if a month later they will break up.

Like all good television, reality TV offers people the viewer can relate to. Though one can argue that none of the characters is "real," their underlying personalities undoubtedly reflect different aspects of our own behaviours and attitudes, thus drawing us in to watch their development.

Leading up to the finale of Friends, interview after interview spoke about the fact that the six main characters reflected every personality type, so that every viewer could identify with one friend on a personal level. Though we all realize the huge New York loft and the wardrobes without repetition to be elusive for any real New York singles of that age and income level, Friends melded the real with the imaginary in such a way as to make it believable.

I argue that reality TV takes the Friends scenario one step further. It is clear that we are fascinated by the lives of celebrities, as illustrated by the ubiquity of tabloids and magazines with the latest stories, interviews and gossip, and by the fact that this kind of information is scattered throughout our own conversations. Reality TV feeds this interest directly. Whether it is valid or not, we feel as if we are watching real people rather than some writer's script.

Somehow, individual stupidity, blanket emotion and even banality, are more engaging than similar depictions created by writers. By following "real" people, we find it easier to become engaged in a personal story, and we care more about the outcome because the situation does not seem as arbitrary as one achieved by a group of writers who select one conclusion rather than another. When Amber Berkich won Survivor All-Stars, viewers saw how players in the game could not separate their emotions from the game.

If nothing else, reality TV offers an indulgence, an opportunity to engage in the mindless, to get swept up in the irrelevant. In a skeptical world where everything is called into question, it is pleasant to sit back and take something at face value.

The Kirshner File

Louis Rubenstein's story recounted on film

At the edge of Fletcher's Field – a park I knew well as a boy and as a teenager in Montreal – and across the street from the old YMHA at the foot of Mount Royal, there is an unobtrusive water fountain dedicated to the long-departed Louis Rubenstein.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In case you haven't heard, he was a world-class athlete who, at various times, was the Canadian, American, North American and world figure skating champion.

On hot summer days, when I happened to be cycling in the vicinity of Fletcher's Field, I would often stop at the weathered fountain.

As I slaked my thirst, I would occasionally be tempted to learn more about Rubenstein than I could read on his plaque on the fountain.

I could have gone to the Jewish Public Library for elucidation, but I never got around to it.

Several weeks ago, I finally sated my curiosity, having watched Inspiring Figure: The Louis Rubenstein Story – a 26-minute biopic directed by Rosalind Raddatz and produced by Iris Wagner – at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

Though their documentary is all too fleetingly brief and does not really plumb the depths of Rubenstein's personality, it touches virtually all the bases of his distinguished career as an athlete, athletic administrator and politician.

Born in 1861 in Montreal, when some 200 Jewish families lived there, he was the son of Max and Leah Rubenstein, Polish Jews who had immigrated to Canada in 1850.

The Rubensteins had 12 children and six of them excelled in sports. Louis, who took up figure skating as a child, surpassed them all on the playing field.

Apart from being a stellar skater, he was an accomplished cyclist, curler and bowler.

At winter carnivals, he would skate rings around his competitors, and when he was 16, he won the city championship.

Cutting a dashing figure in a fancy black bowler hat, Rubenstein captured the North American title in 1885 and defended it successfully for the next four years.

In 1890, he became the first North American champion to compete at a world championship. It took place in St. Petersburg, Russia.

Because he was a Jew, the police pressured him to leave the country. Having expected such harassment from an anti-Semitic government, Rubenstein wisely obtained an introductory letter from Lord Stanley, Canada's governor-general and a fan, before setting out to Russia.

Thanks to Lord Stanley, the British ambassador in Russia intervened on Rubenstein's behalf and he was permitted to participate.

Performing before an audience that included members of the the czar's court, Rubenstein went on to win a gold medal in the figure skating design category.

Then, at the top of his form, he abruptly retired from competition.

Not content to fade away, Rubenstein founded the Canadian Figure Skating Association, whose objective was to standardize the art of judging. Being independently wealthy, he also sponsored gifted young athletes.

Subsequently, he was president of the Montreal Amateur Athletic Association, the Amateur Skating Association of Canada, the Montreal Athletic Commission, the International Skating Union of America and the Young Men's Hebrew Association.

A life-long bachelor who resided on St. Urbain Street with his single siblings, he worked in the family metal finishing business, Rubenstein Brothers.

In 1914, he expanded his horizons when he was elected an alderman in Montreal's Ward 5, which teemed with new immigrants.

Blessed with a sense of noblesse oblige, he was a populist politician who took an interest in the welfare of the poor.

His decision to establish the Rubenstein Bath was of no small importance to poverty-stricken Montrealers who lacked something so basic as running water.

A keen politician, Rubenstein sometimes filled in as mayor. He died in 1931 and his funeral attracted thousand of mourners.

Several years after Rubenstein's passing, a group of well-heeled Montrealers raised about $2,000, no insignificant sum during the Depression, for a fountain in his memory. It was finally erected in 1937.

According to Wagner, the president of Memoirs Productions – a Montreal company specializing in video biographies – the fountain is the only public monument in Montreal, and perhaps in Quebec, honouring a Jew.

When I ventured the heretical observation that a simple fountain seems like a rather modest monument for so prominent a person, she disagreed.

"Water gives life," she countered. "From water springs youth and athleticism."

Not surprisingly, Montreal is not the only city that holds Rubenstein in high regard.

A bronze bust in his likeness adorns the International Skating Hall of Fame in Boulder, Colo.

Richard Pound, a Montrealer who was formerly vice-president of the International Olympic Committee, believes Rubenstein exemplified the Olympic ideal, true sportsmanship and community service.

"He was a complete, well-rounded man," he says in the film. "His life shone by example."

Barbara Ann Scott, a renowned Canadian figure skater and Olympic gold medalist, is even more effusive.

"He was the father of Canadian figure skating," she comments in Inspiring Figure.

For all his fame, Wagner admits, Rubenstein was an unknown quantity to her before she made Inspiring Figure.

She was drawn into the project after chatting with Hillel Becker, the current president of Rubenstein Brothers, now Canada's largest manufacturer of machinery and equipment for the garment industry.

Rubenstein toward the close of his life

Wagner originally approached Becker because she wanted to make a film about his late father, Lavy, a rabbi and a founder of the Reconstructionist movement in Canada.

As they talked, Becker told her about Rubenstein and a box of his mementoes he had recently found.

There and then, they decided he was worthy of a documentary.

Financed by the YM-YWHA Foundation of Montreal, Inspiring Figure had its debut at the Y before being screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival last month.

Rubenstein in his prime

Wagner, a graduate of Bialik High School and Concordia University, researched Rubenstein's life in the Jewish Public Library – where she pored over his scrapbook of newspaper and magazine clippings – and at the McCord Museum.

"He was, to me, the quintessential amateur athlete," she said. "He just wanted to be the best."

And, as Becker says, "He left a great legacy."

Recently, the National Film Board of Canada acquired Inspiring Figure. Now Wagner can rest assured that many more Canadians will become acquainted with Rubenstein's amazing feats on the ice.

Ancestry.com rides the boom

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

In the way that all roads in the Roman Empire led to Rome, anyone who does genealogy-related research on the internet sooner or later is led to Ancestry.com or other related family-tree websites spawned by its parent company, MyFamily.com.

Ancestry.com claims to offer some 3 billion individual records online in a vast informational spectrum that will seem mind-blowing to many users. Each of its screens presents a cornucopia of resources that are accessible to subscribers with the ease of a mouse-click.

For example, the site offers millions of images from the U.S. Census Collection from 1870 to 1930, all indexed and available for instant downloading. It also presents multitudes of birth, marriage and death records, immigrant records, historical newspapers, U.K. records, an obituaries collection and much more.

The opening screen outlines three simple steps: 1. Ancestor's name. 2. Where did they live? 3. Click search. I typed in my ancestral surname "Rubinoff" without specifying a place, and up came a huge list of potential matches from various birth, marriage, death, census, military, newspaper and other data bases, mostly from the United States, Canada and Britain.

The search results initially seemed overwhelming. For example, I had a choice of 193 names in the US census of 1930, 125 names in the US Social Security Death Index, and 102 names in the Ancestry World Tree. I quickly narrowed the search terms to pare down the possibilities to more manageable levels.

At Ancestry.com, the options always seem endless. Did your ancestors serve in the American Civil War? Do their portraits hang in Britain's National Portrait Gallery? The site employs a feng-shui-like strategy to ensure that subscribers never run into the electronic equivalent of a dead end.

Ancestry.com is the little website that grew. A survivor of the dot.com bust of the late '90s, the firm's managers chose to defy the conventional wisdom that the public wouldn't pay for online information. Gambling that roots researchers would pay for the right genealogical stuff, they transformed the company from an advertising-based free website to a paid-subscription service offering a multiverse of digitalized resources.

The privately held, Utah-based company began turning a profit in 2001 and generated nearly $100 million in revenues in 2003. Today it boasts some 1.5 million paid subscribers.

The company uses numerous free data bases to lure casual visitors into its spiderweb of genealogical delights. Confronted with a row of tiny lock symbols beside most of their potential matches, visitors may register by credit card to receive a free two-week trial. Access to the site's various packages ranges from US $39 to $239 per year.

The site includes several gems especially geared for Canadian and Jewish researchers. For example, Avotaynu, Inc. some years ago published the Biographical Dictionary of Canadian Jewry, 1909-1914, the wonderful reference work that Ottawa archivist Lawrence Tapper compiled from the Canadian Jewish Times, a former anglo-Jewish newspaper. Although Tapper also compiled a second volume for 1897 to 1909, it was never published. Both volumes are now searchable on Ancestry.com.

It's not well known that almost all of the company's resources (Tapper's second volume being a rare exception) are in the public domain and available elsewhere for free. Customers pay for the convenience and instant thrill of utilizing the digitalized originals at home, as opposed to visiting a long list of town halls, museums, archives and libraries in the hard-to-navigate real world.

Researchers may try out the site for free at the North York Central Library, Metro Toronto Reference Library and other library branches in Toronto and elsewhere. Alternately, get out your credit card, go online to www.Ancestry.com, and make the jump into genealogical cyberspace without delay.

A show of faith

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

I regard our faith as more of a movement than a religion. When this movement first began at Mount Sinai, its defining characteristic – the one that would set it apart from all the other religions of the world – was the fact Judaism would have only one god: "I am the Lord your God." This first commandment was immediately followed by the words, "You shall have no other gods."

There is much pluralism in our approach to religion. We don't believe that a gentile needs to become a Jew in order to be "saved." We believe they should follow their own faith and that there is room for them in heaven, provided they also believe in only one God. Belief in other gods constitutes idolatry – avodah zarah.

Not only are we not to believe in multiple gods, we may not condone, accept or tolerate anything that may be related to idolatry. One may not have any association with idolaters, one may not enter a temple of idols (as opposed to a place of worship of another monotheistic religion), one may not use figurines of idols to decorate one's home or garden, and one may not benefit in any way from idols or their offerings.

It is because of this last prohibition that observant married woman have recently refrained from covering their heads with wigs made of human hair from India.

In the Hindu religion, there is a concept known as "tonsure," in which an individual forgoes an item of value as a result of good or bad occasions, such as an upcoming celebration or a loss. Giving up a piece of jewelry or cutting one's hair is a form of tonsure.

Hindu temples, primarily in the region of Madras, have barbers stationed outside. Women coming into these temples have their hair cut off before entering the temple. The hair is not considered holy, and neither is it offered to a Hindu god. The hair simply falls to the ground and is discarded. Some enterprising temple workers saw that a profit could be made from this hair, and they began gathering and selling it to be processed into wigs.

Tonsure is not technically a form of worship – it's a preparation for worship, such as bathing.

Living in the western world, one thankfully does not come across much idolatry. But while this concern with the origin of Indian wigs may be quite bizarre, it is, nevertheless, a serious question that had to be addressed.

Is this practice of tonsure idolatrous or not? A definitive ruling has yet to be made. The matter is being investigated both in India at the temple level, with Hindu swamis and lay people, as well as by researching the collected writings of poskim (halachic authorities).

What is especially noteworthy in this otherwise strange episode is the staunch loyalty shown by observant Jewish women upon hearing of this possible problem. Women who go about their life with their heads covered totally refused to don this hair until a decisive ruling is made. Virtually no observant woman will wear wigs of Indian origin. The market for such wigs disappeared overnight. What the ruling on them will be remains to be seen.

It was a demonstration, in the clearest fashion, of unflinching loyalty to the words, "I am the Lord, your God. You shall have no other gods."

18th century British hero returns

A Spectacle of Corruption* by David Liss, Random House $37.95.

Four years ago, A Conspiracy of Paper, Liss's first novel, a masterful recreation of diverse aspects of 18th-century London, with an emphasis on stock market manipulations and multiple murders, was lauded as creative and original. It received the coveted Edgar Award for Best First Mystery Novel for 2000.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Now, A Spectacle of Corruption once again plunges the reader into 18th-century English political intrigue and compelling mystery. It should find a widespread and enthusiastic readership.

Historical novelists must get things to look and sound right. They must create a world of the past that functions believably, sentence by sentence, and build an environment for their characters that is more than an artificially decorated set.

Benjamin Weaver, the protagonist in both novels, is a memorable character. He is a "thief taker" by profession, the man to hire if you are eager to retrieve a stolen item, locate an elusive criminal or make sure a debt is repaid. As a tough Jewish, one-time pugilist and risk taker, Weaver is a classic outsider.

The novel begins with Weaver on trial for a murder he did not commit. He and his friends are shocked when he is quickly convicted and sentenced to an even quicker hanging. As he is led to Newgate Prison, he is surreptitiously handed a lock pick and file by an unknown courtroom spectator.

With these tools and the aid of a friendly fellow-inmate, Weaver is able to escape from his fetid, dungeon-like imprisonment.

The author, a historian with a popular touch, indicates that in the year 1772, England was embroiled in a Parliamentary election, properly viewed as a referendum on the rule of King George III. Rival political parties include the Whigs, who favour business and electoral reform, the Tories who are patrician advocates of a strong monarchy and the Jacobites who despise King George and want to replace him. Before the story runs its course, the reader learns much about the bizarre and turbulent political scene.

Weaver disappears into London's dark and dangerous streets, evading those who would collect the substantial bounty on his head and eager to unravel the two mysteries: Who are those who sought his death and who is the benefactor who provided the tools that led him to freedom?

Eventually, Weaver disguises himself as a wealthy planter, newly arrived from the West Indies. As a gentleman, at home in society, he gradually discovers that the scheme to see him hanged has its roots in a much larger and dangerous cabal: the safety of the entire realm may be in question.

Liss brings to life a teeming, brawling London where decorous society coexisted with public hangings and where filth and disease were everywhere. Adherents of political parties gathered in taverns to witness cruel cockfights.

Crucial to the unfolding story is Weaver's Jewish heritage. At every turn, he is confronted with ignorance and bias. He finds it impossible to avoid the label that perverse elements in English society would apply to him. How Jews were to be treated was a source of controversy between the political parties with the Whigs hostile and anti-Semitic.

Protean Weaver encounters religious prejudice and overcomes the menace of both colourful rogues and dangerous toughs from the city's docks. The hazards are manifold, but our hero is up to the challenge.

This is a suspenseful, cleverly plotted novel and also a knowledgeable explication of the intricacies of English political life three centuries ago.

Jewish MP3s, part 2: Music

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Drop by your local Judaica store and you're bound to find some interesting Jewish music for sale. But chances are they're not stocking much Jewish rap or Jewish reggae or the latest Jewish recording from the Czech Republic. That's where the Internet comes in handy. There's a world of music on the web waiting to be downloaded. Artists actually want you to download some of their work, no strings attached. Actually, there is a tiny string. They hope that after you listen to a cut or two, you'll shell out for the entire disk. Today, I'll point you toward some great Jewish MP3s.

Who wouldn't want Robin Selinger as their teacher? Selinger is a music teacher at Temple Sholom in Chevy Chase, Md. She has scoured the Internet for Jewish music for kids and the result is her Tot-Shabbat website [www.totshabbat.com]. You'll find recommendations to free music from dozens of artists including Craig Taubman, Carol Boyd Leon and Cantor Marcelo Gindlin. Most songs are in RealAudio format, but there are also MP3s as well as links to sheet music pdf's that can also be downloaded. (Highly recommended for teachers planning ahead for September!)

One you're done at TotShabbat, switch over to its companion HotShabbat website [www.hotshabbat.com/]. You'll find even more links to wonderful Shabbat and Israeli tunes such as Henei Matov, Torah Tzivah Lanu Moshe, and Oseh Shalom (reggae version). By the way, there's an entire subgenre out there devoted to Jewish reggae and ska music with its own website [www.irielion.com/israel/jewishreggae.html].

While I was at Tot-Shabbat, I was lucky to chance upon a reference to a women's choir named Adash. Adash is an acronym for "Ivrit derech shirim" (Hebrew through songs). The Adash choir was created through the efforts of Tomas Novotny of the University of Ostrava in the Czech Republic. Novotny uses song to teach Hebrew and the results are remarkable. You can download more than a dozen full-length songs by this charming choir including Lu Yehi, Dror Yikrah and Rad Halaylah. Rarely has Havah Nagilah sounded so kitsch-free [www.osu.cz/adash/prvnieng.htm].

Who knew there were rap and hip hop sub-genres to Jewish music? The Jewish Rapper presents tunes such as Recognize the Miracles and Kid With The Lid [http://tinyurl.com/2r3x3]. And Kid Kosher presents more traditional fare, such as Spin the Dreidel [www.kidkosher.net/].

Unfortunately, neither Kid Kosher nor the Jewish Rapper gives you full tracks, but after sampling their work, you'll get the idea whether you want to buy more.

If you like your Jewish music with a New Age twist, then you'll love Kabbalistic Music: Melodies of the World. You'll find a large selection of downloadable melodies, many of which border on the melancholy. As the site explains, "The kabbalist, in his perception of existence, apprehends two opposing situations: distress from his separation from the Creator, and pleasure at nearing the Creator. This feeling of distress gives rise to a sad melody which expresses spiritual distress and prayer. Even though the melody may bring one to tears, one loves to hear it because the melody expresses distress that has been mitigated, and has received its fullness. That is, that in particular they are able to bring one nearer to spirituality" [http://kabbalah.info/engkab/mmedia.htm].

Looking for more songs to download? Take a listen at Adama's Hebrew Love Songs, including Sh'nai Shoshanim and Bashanah Habaah [www.adamamusic.net/songs.html]. Jacob Richman has amassed dozens of Jewish Music Hot Sites, many with downloadable MP3 tunes [www.jr.co.il/hotsites/j-music.htm].

How to properly finish this column? With Adon Olam, of course. You can fill your hard drive with several versions of the famous prayer including Chabad Brazil's traditional version [http://tinyurl.com/yvlzs], another by Moshe Skier [www.mosheskier.com/music.htm] and one by Portland, Ore.'s Neveh Shalom [http://tinyurl.com/34sez]. Or take a listen to the students at Pennsylvania's Haverform College sing it à la Billy Joel's "For the Longest Time" [http://tinyurl.com/3y72m].

Fighting for the legitimacy of Israel

Journalist says world Jewry must stay updated on Israel's rights

By WENDY LAMPERT
UJA Federation

The clock is ticking backwards in Israel's fight for the right to exist, says a prominent American-Israeli journalist.

"We've rewound Jewish history to the point that once again, we're fighting for the legitimacy of the state," Dan Diker told community members at a series of briefings sponsored by UJA Federation last month. Diker is the Knesset Affairs correspondent for Israel's Channel One English News.

"The legitimacy of the Jewish Zionist enterprise is under attack by the Arab world, but also by much of the western world," said Diker.

And it's the United Nations that is leading the charge by passing resolutions that de-legitimize the State of Israel, Diker added. What's worse is that there is no international response to these actions.

"[UN Secretary-General] Kofi Annan calls Israel the poison of the Middle East, and there's no backlash. The level of defamation of Israel is so high that its legitimacy as a country is now in question."

The only way to counter this worldview on the international stage is to stay informed and speak out, he added.

"Staying updated about Israel's rights is crucial to fight the battle for Israel's existence as a sovereign state with secure and defensible borders."

The Israeli government's recent decision to enter Gaza provides a perfect example of how the world views Israel's actions, Diker noted.

"Since the mid-1990s there has been a massive increase in terror infrastructure, much of which has not been reported internationally in the media," he said. Despite "wall-to-wall support" in Israel for the fight against Palestinian terrorism and an Israeli Supreme Court ruling that the Israeli Defense Forces were justified in entering Gaza, Amnesty International calls Israel's moves "war crimes," Diker said.

But Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's efforts to unilaterally withdraw from Gaza were voted down by his own Likud party because of fears that the IDF's ability to act from within Gaza would be eliminated.

"It would empower the Palestinian Authority to create a hornet's nest of terrorism in Gaza, even worse than it is today," he said. "It lets them know that terrorism works."

A unilateral withdrawal from Gaza would also likely lead to international pressure for Israel to do the same in the West Bank, Diker added.

Dan Diker

And ironically, said Diker, an Israeli pullout from Gaza would lead to the creation of the first contiguous Palestinian state. "The Arabs had three opportunities to do this, and didn't."

legacy of life

Jordan Propas 1980 - 2001

The life legacy of Jordan Propas resides in the thrill of a child who explores summer camp for the first time and the bonds of friendship created there.

On March 16, 2001, Jordan came home from Huron College at the University of Western Ontario as he often did, to spend Shabbat with his family because his mother Lolly was terminally ill with cancer. He knew that these times with his father Lorne and his sister Brandi always brought a smile to his mother's face. On March 16, 2001, the family shared a wonderful evening filled with joy and laughter. Saturday morning Jordan was returning to school to participate in a charity event when he was killed in a car accident. Sadly, 12 days later, Lolly passed away.

The short life of Jordan Propas has touched so many in a very profound way. Jordan was passionate about camp, having spent his summers as a camper and a counsellor at Camp White Pine. The friendships that are built at camp are treasures that remain strong through distances and years.

David Brand, who came to camp from Pittsburgh and spent 10 summers with Jordan, has such incredible memories not only of camp, but of the "warmth and laughter" that were foundations of the Propas home. He, along with seven other friends, created the Jordan Propas Camp Scholarship Fund in Jordan's honour to send economically disadvantaged children to recreational camps each summer. David Brand, David Chottiner, Joel Goldbach, Alex Iscoe, Josh Kornblum, Jon Persofsky, Mark Salsberg and Rick Siger are original founders of the Fund, who along with Dan Whitefield, one of Jordan's oldest friends, continue to oversee, manage and direct its intricacies. It is a heartwarming tribute to Jordan to realize how many people from camps and universities participate in co-ordinating and organizing fundraising events that contribute to the Fund, says Joel Goldbach. "The number of people who were friends with him is remarkable! The response to the Fund is overwhelming. He was really close with a lot of people; he was a good friend." This is a formidable and diverse group of young men in their early twenties whose careers and educations have spread them across North America.

Jordan with cousins Michal and Debra at Camp White Pine, Summer of 1998.

The group has developed a wonderful relationship with the professional staff at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto who administer the endowment monies raised by the Fund and, in turn, facilitate sending children to various recreational summer camps eligible under this program. Including this coming summer, five children will have been beneficiaries of the Fund.

Alex Iscoe, one of the founders, relates, "In a very short period of time we have quadrupled our assets. We have put the money in a very safe place and are letting the Foundation's investment committee work for us. We conservatively just use the interest generated by the Fund and let the principal accumulate. We contribute to it from annual fundraising events."

Lorne Propas, Jordan's father, comments, "I think it is great that these young men connected with the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto and its resources to have access to the right agencies to identify the children who will benefit the most from this opportunity. It is quite an accomplishment that they actually got it going and have maintained it. The Fund has also become a very unique link between these young men. Although none of them are at camp anymore, they continue to work together on various fundraising events that keep them connected to each other and, through this, to Jordan. They see it as a legacy to Jordan," says Lorne.

Jordan was passionate about life. He had that special quality that endeared him to both a wide circle and an intimate group of friends and he is poignantly missed by all whose lives he touched. Today, the Jordan Propas Camp Scholarship Fund stands as a resounding testament to the deep-rooted connections Jordan forged with his friends during those golden summers. This was the motivation behind the Fund; his friends knew that Jordan would have loved this idea.

The Jordan Propas Camp Scholarship Fund is an inspiring fulfilment of friendship and a magical gift enabling children to experience summers at camp. With this loving legacy, the name Jordan Propas will stand forever amongst his friends, his family, his community and the number of children whose lives will be touched.

If you would like additional information on the Fund, please contact Angela D'Aversa at 416-631-5833 or adaversa@ujafed.org.

JEWISH TORONTO IS PUBLISHED AS A COMMUNITY SERVICE BY UJA FEDERATION OF GREATER TORONTO.

Walk with Israel draws thousands

Keeping it in the family

By TAALI LESTER
UJA Federation

The crowds have gone home and the celebration has ended, but spirits remain high as the 34th annual UJA Federation Walk with Israel ended with incredible success. On Sunday, May 30, thousands of community members turned out to walk in solidarity with Israel and against the forces of hate in an effort to show Toronto, Canada and the world their commitment to Israel and to fighting antisemitism.

During this time of uncertainty and challenge, Jewish communities around the world are striving to find ways to show their strong bond with Israel and Jews across the globe. The UJA Federation Walk with Israel is the world's largest solidarity walk on Israel's behalf. Toronto's most popular annual event raised several hundred thousand dollars to help Israel's most vulnerable.

For the Cohen family, their first experience at the Walk with Israel was thrilling. Shira and Steven Cohen, with their three children - Dalya, 10, Sarit, 8 and Gilli, 5 - woke up early on Sunday morning, eager to get started.

"Especially with all the antisemitic incidents that have been happening around our city in the last couple of months, I really felt it was important to bring our kids out and let them be a part of this day," Shira enthused. "It's a wonderful way for a family to participate together in celebration of something as important as supporting Israel and standing up to hatred. I want my kids to understand the impact they can have as part of a community and that they can make a difference, even in their own small way."

Other families chose to express their solidarity with Israel by volunteering at the event and encouraging others as they made their way through the checkpoints.

Max and Ivy Eisen have been volunteering at the Walk with Israel, with their two grown sons, Eddie and Larry, for years. The family members take turns sitting at various checkpoints cheering on the walkers and offering kind words of support.

"We all know how difficult and trying these times are, both here at home and in Israel, where people are really struggling," Ivy said emotionally. "But it is encouraging to see all these people contributing in this way. It's just so important to my family to do what we can and show the world how strong we can be when we all come together. I wouldn't be anywhere else."

A sense of the Jewish community

UJA Federation to undertake major survey

With a rapidly growing and diverse Jewish population of more than 180,000 in the Greater Toronto Area, planning for the future of Toronto's Jewish community is crucial.

That's why UJA Federation will be conducting a comprehensive survey to understand the attitudes, beliefs and behaviour of the Jews who make up our unique community in order to better assess its varied needs and expectations.

The survey will include interviews with more than 1,000 Jewish community members about a range of subjects, including Jewish identification, antisemitism, Israel, community services and other relevant topics.

UJA Federation will be conducting a survey this summer to identify the future needs and expectations of Toronto's diverse Jewish community of more than 180,000.

The study promises to be the most comprehensive ever undertaken by the Jewish community, and undeniably one of the most significant planning tools for community workers, said Charles Shahar, Chief Researcher for the National Jewish Demographic Study and lead consultant on this survey.

"In these challenging times, it is critical that the Jewish Federation system stay in touch with its constituency. We need to know what Toronto Jews are thinking, what they are concerned about, what their needs are and how we can best serve them. We want to be as informed as possible when making decisions that will influence the community in the coming decades."

In contrast to past surveys, Shahar said this analysis will also work to represent those individuals who may express their Judaism in less obvious or traditional styles, in an effort to discover the varied ways Toronto Jews identify with their culture and heritage.

As a planning tool, this survey will be invaluable in gauging the various barriers to Jewish practice and community participation and what programs could improve conditions for those feeling distanced from the community, Shahar said. It will also outline the important efforts already being made in the community that work to encourage Jewish affiliation and identification, he added.

The survey will be conducted throughout the summer, with a major report on the results expected in October or November. Shahar hopes that all those in the community who are contacted for the survey will be willing to participate in a full, honest manner.

"The benefits for the community will be immeasurable," he said.

Rebuilding a school and a community

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is reaching out to help Jews in Montreal affected by criminal acts of hate through its United Talmud Torah Library Fund. Created to help one of Montreal's oldest Jewish community institutions rebuild its library following a firebombing on the eve of Passover, UJA Federation recently presented a cheque for $66,000, the first installment from the Fund to Montreal's FEDERATION CJA. Students celebrate Yom Yerushalayim via satellite

By CARA EDELL
CJN Intern

Grade 8 students from the United Synagogue Day School (USDS), Bayview branch, gathered May 19 at York University for a Yom Yerushalayim simulcast video conference centred at Israel's Western Wall.

37th year since city's reunification

Celebrating the 37th year since the unification of Jerusalem, classes from Bialik Hebrew Day School and the Jewish Day School in Allentown, Pa., also took part in the interactive session.

Glitches in the satellite system caused the program to be cut from an hour to 15 minutes for the USDS participants, but they nonetheless had an opportunity to experience the event.

The event allowed the North American students to broadcast presentations relating to the Israeli flag and Jewish historical objects.

"Each school chose an item," said Ricky Dahan, a Grade 8 teacher at USDS. "We chose the menorah."

The program involved an Israeli paratrooper pulling each represented item from a sack. Pretending to be unaware of what the objects symbolize, the soldier relied on the students for help.

The USDS students sang, "The menorah stood in the temple/ The southern wall was its place/ The menorah had branches/ Which glowed day and night."

Dahan said the kids "worked very hard in small groups" to write the lyrics themselves, and they did it in the midst of exams.

Despite their disappointment at the conference's late start, the USDS students made the most of the time they were allotted to present their compositions.

Prior to the event, Israeli flags were sent to Jerusalem with signs of each school attached to them. The USDS flag was purchased through the donation of a USDS parent and was held on screen in Israel by a student's uncle and cousin.

Before leaving the session, a group of male students from USDS sang about the Israeli flag to the music of their classmate's guitar:

"A flag of peace/ A flag of love/ Blue like the sea/ White like a dove."

Zionists face abuse on campus, panel told

By JESSICA HELLEN
CJN Intern

Paul Cooper is accustomed to being called "racist" and "fascist" for his support of Israel.

The York University undergraduate says students involved in activism of any kind are used to being called names, but outspoken Zionists are particularly targeted.

"Being a supporter of Israel on campus, inevitably I'm called a racist, likely a fascist. It's happened to me many times," said Cooper, who is president of the York Federation of Students, as well as president of Betar-Tagar at York and a co-founder of the Young Zionist Partnership.

Cooper was speaking May 20 on a panel of three Toronto-area students – two Jews and one Muslim – at Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Congregation in a symposium titled "Israel and Today's Campus."

"I think campus remains a mystery to many people," said moderator Elliott Malamet, a professor at Queens University and a teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

"They read about it, they see things about Concordia [University in Montreal], they see things about San Francisco State, they see things about York University, but they don't really know about it."

Rana El-Sayed, a Muslim student at the University of Toronto and president of the University College Literary and Athletic Society, said it has been "easy and fun" being a Muslim on campus. She said she even received positive feedback when she was chosen to go on a student leadership trip to Israel last year.

El-Sayed said she has been in many classes related to the Middle East where professors have steered clear of any discussion or debate when the topic turned to Israel and the Palestinians.

In one of her Middle East studies classes, she said, "the professor didn't let us get into anything beyond facts and beyond history."

This leads to problems, El-Sayed said, because students go outside the classroom to get information and end up joining extremist groups.

"That's really unfortunate," she said. "There are so many groups who put out so much information, but the problem is that a lot of it's not sourced and you don't know where it's coming from."

Daniel Roth, a University of Toronto student and president of Hashomer Hatzair on campus, said that being active doesn't necessarily mean being extreme.

"I'm not an extremist and I'm one of the most active people I know," Roth said.

He said most Jewish students get their information about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict from the Globe and Mail, the CBC, friends and the groups they join.

"There's a small minority of people who really know all the history," he said.

The panelists discussed the importance of visiting Israel and what it can do to a person's outlook.

El-Sayed said going to Israel was a "life-changing experience" for her.

"It brought everything into perspective," she said. "It opened my eyes to where bias sits."

Cooper agreed.

"I've been there over 20 times," he said. "Going there makes the learning more real. It creates a sense of objectivity."

Malamet asked the panelists about the value of listening to other peoples' opinions, which Roth said was very important, whether they be "polar opposite or slightly different" than his own.

"You can define your own views better by hearing what other people have to say," he said.

"There's no sense educating unless you're willing to be educated."

The students then spoke about the changes they would like to see on their campuses.

"More accurate information," said El-Sayed. "Knowing where things are coming from and what's the background."

Roth said there are many campus groups that need to open themselves up to debate.

"There are too many who would like to silence debate," he said. "I find that disgusting and anti-democratic."

Cooper said he thinks Jewish and Muslim campus groups need to take principled positions "and inspire students to act."

The panel discussion was presented by Beth David's continuing education and Israel committees.

You And Your Money

A monthly feature by Michael Korman of Raymond James Ltd.

Higher Income in Uncertain Times

With the availability of a wide variety of bonds — from mortgage to convertible to real return and government bonds — your advisor can help you select those bonds most suitable for your investment objectives and income stream requirements. Income funds, managed by managers from Dynamic Mutual Funds and Acuity Investment Management, have given investors consistent high income and diversification in one investment. For example, the Dynamic Dividend Income Fund will offer investors a mix of higher income corporate bonds, preferred shares, and select income trusts, dividend common shares, and other short term debt obligations.

Same bond, different ratings

Income diversification may be a foreign concept to many investors, who typically think of diversification for stock investments but not for income products. For example, one type of bond that is often overlooked and best advised by an investment professional is the high yield bond. Unique in the investment universe, high yield bonds combine some of the best characteristics of income and equity products. These investments could help diversify your bond holdings and enhance your income potential.

Bonds can be separated into two categories: investment grade and high yield. Both classes have a coupon rate and a maturity date. The difference between the two types resides in their credit rating, which is best determined by a bond rating agency. Mutual fund teams usually have a dedicated credit analyst in bonds to assist the fund manager in deciding which investment grade and which high yield bonds should be owned in a fund. For this reason, you may be better off paying for the expertise of a fund manager rather than attempting to buy and sell corporate and other high yield bonds individually.

Ratings range from AAA for the highest quality bonds to D for the lowest quality bonds that are in default. Dominion Bond Rating Service (DBRS), Moody's, and Standard and Poor's Ltd. are among the well-known rating services that most bond fund managers monitor carefully.

If you're thinking about bonds, consider looking for those with a rating of BBB and higher, as these are rated investment grade by the rating agencies. Those below BBB are considered high yield. Be aware that the same bond can carry different ratings by different agencies. The ratings themselves can differ, such as AA, AA-, or AA+. Some investors may ignore bond ratings (Air Canada) in the belief that the familiarity of the company name will support the prices of their bonds and the higher yields these bonds may offer. You may find it easier to let a mutual fund manager buy and sell bonds on your behalf to diversify your income. Acuity, for example, adds a twenty percent Income Trust component to their fixed income fund so that some of the "fixed income" you receive is tax deferred through select income trusts. In 2003, this strategy yielded investors a remarkable 14.87% return including the fund manager fee.

Let's take a closer look at what happens when bonds are downgraded. If an investor owns a bond that is downgraded, it may be easier to sell if it was purchased at higher than the minimum BBB investment grade rating. Since bonds that are downgraded often see their principal value decline, an investor who buys an AA bond that is downgraded to BBB may still sell the bond and potentially receive much or all of his original principal. You may consider the use of a bond mutual fund or bond pool since several downgrades could occur at once, thereby affecting your principal value. A diversified basket of securities may offset several downgrades and better safeguard your principal. Meanwhile, your income stream may remain unaffected.

High Yield Bonds. Aside from the credit rating, the obvious difference in high yield bonds is the higher level of interest income they generate. Like investment grade bonds, high yield bonds pay interest income and have a maturity date that will result in a return of the par value of the bond. Both provide a constant stream of income to the bond holder during the life of the bond. However, due to increased lending risk, the high yield bonds will give you higher interest than investment grade bonds. High yield bonds funds, such as the Dynamic Canadian High Yield Bond Fund and the Guardian Canadian High Yield Fund, may increase in value in rising Canadian equity markets. These funds typically hold 25 or more bonds from differing industries, making diversification easy for the investor.

Lower default risk with investment grade bonds

High yield bonds also have a greater potential for capital appreciation, a trait they share with equities. The increased price appreciation potential is usually due to changes in default risk. Conversely, investment grade bonds such as government and high-grade corporate bonds have much less chance of defaulting on their bond obligations. Because high yield bonds do not have the same direct relationship with interest rates, they can also be influenced by specific company events.

Past High Yield Returns. In 2001, a difficult year in the equity markets, the U.S. price return for high yield bonds was -3.9%, the income return 10.09%, for a net return of 6.19%. In 1991, as inflation picked up, the price return was 18.38% while the income return was 34.58%. It is possible that 2005 will see similar inflationary economic conditions to those of 1991, so I do like the idea of adding a high yield bond process to qualifying client portfolios for diversification of income.

Next time you're thinking of diversifying your portfolio, remember that income classes can also be diversified. You may enhance your income — and your money.

Living with the fog of war

According to Reports
By PAUL MICHAELS

The "fog of war" is an apt image to describe the confusion that confronts journalists trying to file a report from a conflict zone. Under constant deadline pressure, a conscientious journalist will make the best effort to be accurate and fair.

When accuracy may not be possible because of circumstances – no access to the scene, lack of credible sources, or conflicting information with little time to sort it out – the reporter should be prepared to admit these limitations. James Bennet in the New York Times (May 21) referred to this state of confusion as the "war of fog."

Two weeks ago during a demonstration in Rafah in the Gaza Strip, eight Palestinians were tragically killed (among them children and teenagers) and scores injured when tank shells were fired by the Israel Defence Forces. Some reporters were quick to pass judgment, while others took a more cautious approach.

Mark MacKinnon's May 20 Globe and Mail article "UN deplores deadly attack in Gaza" began: "Ten Palestinians, mainly children and teenagers, were killed yesterday and 50 people injured when an Israeli tank shell ripped through a crowd in the Gaza Strip."

MacKinnon provided no verifiable evidence that the shell "ripped through" the crowd. His lead paragraph gave the impression, however unintentional, that the IDF deliberately aimed at the crowd. It is only later in the article that we read the Israeli account: "Israeli defence officials said the incident was under investigation, but acknowledged it was 'possible' that tank fire intended to deter the demonstrators from moving forward caused the deaths. They said the tank fire was directed at an abandoned structure at the side of the road."

In a May 20 Associated Press story, Khalil Hamra put Israel's response to the events closer to the lead: "Israel apologized for the deaths, saying its troops did not deliberately fire on marchers. A preliminary army investigation concluded that a warning shot fired by a tank flew through a building and hit the crowd, security sources said on condition of anonymity."

On CBC TV's The National on May 20, reporter Adrienne Arsenault described the devastation to the Palestinians, but also included a statement from IDF spokesperson Sharon Feingold, who said: "Tank shells were fired towards an empty building, not towards the crowd, in order to deter the Palestinians from approaching. As a result of this fire, it seems that Palestinian civilians were injured and killed. We express our deepest sorrow for the incident."

Significantly, towards the end of her report, Arsenault said: "Really, the facts of what happened today are still murky."

While the facts may have been murky, the damage to Israel's image was clear. Several leading Israeli commentators noted that whatever the precise details, the fact was that many innocent Palestinians were killed by IDF fire.

Ze'ev Schiff, in his May 20 Ha'aretz column headlined "End of the Rainbow," wrote: "In any case, Israel with this one action has lost international understanding."

And Danny Rothschild, a former army general and former co-ordinator of Israeli operations in the West Bank and Gaza, when interviewed on Israeli TV, was blunt: "You don't disperse demonstrations using tank shells."

It is true that, as Israel Defence Minister Saul Mofaz said while expressing regret at the loss of innocent lives, "no other army in the world could have conducted similar warfare against terrorists for 3½ years with so few civilian casualties." However, Israel – and her supporters – are rightly concerned about how best to safeguard Palestinian civilians who may be caught in a conflict zone, and who are often cynically misused by their own leadership.

Indeed, the National Post, in an unusually harsh editorial rebuke ("Reckless in Gaza," May 21), criticized Israel for failing to "conduct its anti-terror campaign with due regard for the safety of Palestinian civilians."

NCJW to hold program on depression

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section, is sponsoring a symposium called "Demystifying Depression" at Council House, 4700 Bathurst St., June 10 at 7:30 p.m.

Admission is $10 and reservations are encouraged.

The event is being planned by the organization's health issues committee, headed by Honey Mostyn.

Its last program, held in the fall, was on infectious diseases. "Very a propos, as it turned out," Mostyn said, referring to the SARS crisis of last year.

When the committee was discussing what to do for its second program, "we kept coming back to depression, how common it is, its identification, its characteristics, the treatment," she said.

Response so far has been wonderful, Mostyn said.

Guest speakers will be psychiatrist David Goldbloom from the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health, who will outline the medical and psychiatric characteristics of depression, as well as symptoms, treatments, and myths; Karen Liberman, executive director of the Mood Disorders Association, who will discuss the impact of depression on families and their role in recovery; and Carolyn Kirk, a psychologist in private practice, whose subject has not yet been announced. Moderator will be Toronto Star journalist Robin Harvey.

Participants will be given an information package that includes such things as community resources for those suffering from depression, and they will be asked for suggestions for future programs.

Both men and women are welcome.

Cantor celebrates 50 years at Winnipeg shul

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — As he approaches his 90th birthday in June, Winnipeg's beloved cantor, Rabbi Louis Berkal, continues to lead services Monday and Thursday mornings at the Shaarey Zedek Synagogue, and he regularly attends Shabbat services.

He is also teaching a neighbour Hebrew, his daughter Harriet Berkal-Sarbit says, and he has begun taking violin lessons again.

Berkal-Sarbit notes her father is still doing Tuesday afternoon concerts with Rabbi Neal Rose at the Sharon Home's Simkin Centre in south Winnipeg. He also performs concerts with his teenage granddaughter, Sophie Berkal-Sarbit.

On Monday, June 21, the Shaarey Zedek Congregation, will hold a special evening of music and reminiscences in celebration of Rabbi Berkal's 50-year association with the synagogue.

Continues to lead services as he approaches his 90th birthday

"We will be highlighting Rabbi Berkal's contributions to our synagogue," says event chair Evelyn Hecht. "He will be singing along with the synagogue choir and some alumni who used to sing in the choir when he was at his peak. There will also be two short audio-visual presentation and a skit about a chazzan applying for a job."

Hecht says Shaarey Zedek's celebration of Rabbi Berkal will not be a fundraiser.

"There have been tributes to Rabbi Berkal in the past, but ours will be different," she says. "There will be no admission charge. This is an opportunity for everyone in the community whom he has touched to come and honour him."

Both Hecht and Harriet Berkal-Sarbit note that during his 50-year tenure at the Shaarey Zedek, the cantor has touched the lives of a large number of people whose life-cycle events he has officiated at. Hecht also points out that Rabbi Berkal is the longest serving cantor in western Canada and, she believes, anywhere in Canada.

Rabbi Berkal came to Canada and Winnipeg with his family in 1927. On arrival, he continued the yeshiva studies he had begun in Lithuania. Here he studied with Winnipeg's chief rabbi Israel Kahanovitch. He also joined the Talmud Torah Choir, becoming a tenor soloist under Cantor Benjamin Brownstone.

In 1939, Rabbi Berkal accepted his first pulpit in Grand Forks, N.D., a small city about 200 kilometres south of Winnipeg. He met his wife to be, Sara Ginsberg, in Grand Forks, where he served the Jewish community for 16 years before accepting the position of assistant rabbi and cantor at the Shaarey Zedek.

Hecht says one of the most remarkable features about Rabbi Berkal's career at the Shaarey Zedek has been his ability to get along with all the rabbis he has had to work with, and to bridge different eras and philosophies.

Over the years, he has helped prepare hundreds of children for their bar and bat mitzvahs and has spent countless hours visiting the sick at home and in hospital. He also played an important role in establishing the Ramah Hebrew School, the first day school in Canada to be affiliated with a Conservative congregation.

In the wider community, Rabbi Berkal was a leader in developing interfaith relationships and served several terms on the Interfaith Council.

"What is remarkable is that I have never heard anyone say anything negative about my father," Berkal-Sarbit says.

In addition to Rabbi Berkal celebrating his 90th birthday in June and 50 years as the chazzan at the Shaarey Zedek, Rabbi Berkal's wife, Sara, is turning 87 at the same time, and he and Sara are celebrating their 65th wedding anniversary. To celebrate the latter event, Berkal-Sarbit notes that the family is also planning a Berkal family reunion to coincide with the other celebrations – with cousins coming from as far away as South Africa.

תשובה לג'ורג' יעקובוביץ"

סחר חופשי ישראל-ירדן

וזהב באירופה

Skill at the Grill!

By NORENE GILLETZ

Few things can make our mouths water like the smell of wood smoke and food grilling in the open air. Besides the casual ambience and camaraderie of good friends and family, food somehow tastes better cooked on an open fire.

When it comes to barbecues, Canadians continue to sizzle, according to the 12th Annual Weber Canadian Barbecue Survey (TM). According to the survey of 1,000 Canadian residents who currently own a gas, charcoal or electric outdoor grill, steak is now the No.1 grilled item, beating out last year's most grilled item, hamburgers. Chicken pieces remain No. 3.

It should come as no surprise that 35 per cent of Canadians think it is very important to own an outdoor grill

It should come as no surprise that 35 per cent of Canadians think it is very important to own an outdoor grill to use in case of emergencies. Birthdays top the list of grilling celebrations, followed by Canada Day, Labour Day and Victoria Day. Canadians continue to brave the outdoors – 41 per cent have grilled at below freezing and 48 per cent of all respondents say they grill year-round. Twenty-six percent of respondents admitted to serving something they dropped on the ground! (I wonder how many weren't so honest?)

Most people think that barbecuing and grilling would be ideal for the low-carb dieter because the focus is on large quantities of meat, poultry and fish. But did you ever check the label on that bottle of commercial barbecue sauce? Simply put, most barbecue sauces and marinades are loaded with sugar. Most brands range between 8 and 14 grams of carbohydrate for a 2-tbsp. serving. Homemade barbecue sauce recipes start with sugary commercial ketchup, and then add a cup or more of sugar.

Dana Carpender has come to the rescue with her newest collection of low-carb recipes, which is hot off the press. The Low-Carb Barbecue Book (Fair Winds Press; $24.95 Cdn) contains more than 200 mouthwatering recipes that will make your summer sizzle!

Carpender is a nationally syndicated columnist and appears frequently on radio and television. She publishes Lowcarbezine, the popular Internet newsletter. Dana has been eating a low-carb diet for the last nine years and is the author of four other books, including 500 Low-Carb Recipes and How I Gave Up my Low-Fat Diet and Lost Forty Pounds.

Each chapter focuses on a specific component of barbecue, including marinades, rubs, mopping sauces, side dishes, meat, poultry, grilled vegetables – even dessert. This is not a kosher cookbook, but many recipes can be adapted for the kosher kitchen.

Here are some recipes from The Low-Carb Barbecue Book that will turn your barbecue into a summer feast. You don't need to be on a low-carb diet to enjoy them!

APRICOT-ROSEMARY GLAZED CHICKEN BREASTS

Very speedy, especially if you have a gas grill, and very good!

2 tbsp. low-sugar apricot preserves
2 tsp. ground rosemary
2 tsp. lemon juice
2 cloves garlic, crushed
4 boneless, skinless chicken breasts –1½ to 2 lb.

First, light your charcoal or start heating your gas grill. You'll want medium heat.

Simply combine everything but the chicken breasts in a bowl and mix well. Cut your chicken breasts into serving-sized portions if needed. Start the chicken breasts grilling over medium heat, brushing the side that's up with apricot mixture. After about 7 minutes, brush with apricot mixture again, turn, and brush with the glaze again. Grill another 7 minutes or so, brushing a couple of times with the apricot glaze, but stop basting with a few minutes of cooking time to go, so as not to reintroduce raw chicken germs to your dinner!

When the breasts are done through, serve. If there's any apricot glaze remaining, you can heat it thoroughly in the microwave – make sure it boils hard! – and spoon it over the breasts before serving. Yield: 4 servings.

Each serving will have 4 grams of carbohydrate and a trace of fibre.

Assuming 1½ lb. of chicken, each serving will have 38 grams of protein.

EASY GRILLED ZUCCHINI

Carpender suggests using smallish zucchinis only because they look nice. If you've got big zucchinis, feel free to cut them up! You can also use yellow summer squash if you prefer.

6 smallish zucchinis
½ cup bottled Italian dressing (not creamy style)

Split your zucchinis lengthwise and cut off the stems. Put them in a big zipper-lock bag and pour the dressing over them. Press the air out of the bag, seal it, and turn it over a few times to coat the zucchinis. Now stash them in the fridge until dinner.

When suppertime rolls around, pull out the bag, pour off the dressing into a bowl or pan, and throw the zucchinis onto the grill. Baste them with the dressing and grill them until they are getting soft, with brown stripes; then serve. Yield: 6 servings.

If you consumed all the salad dressing, each serving would have 8 grams of carbohydrate and 2 grams of fibre, but you'll discard most of the dressing. Figure closer to 4 grams carbohydrate per serving, with the same 2 grams of fibre, for a usable carb count of around 2 grams per serving and 2 grams of protein.

D-Day 60th Remembrance

Many were in that first wave of soldiers who cracked the Nazis' defences and began the liberation of western Europe. Eddie Goodman, who later became a prominent Toronto lawyer, was a tank commander on D-Day in the Fort Gary Horse, a Winnipeg-based cavalry regiment that hit the beaches in specially adapted tanks.

Goodman had enlisted in the army early in the war, right out of law school, ready for a fight. He and his comrades saw the Germans as "no good sons of bitches," and after several years of training in Canada and England, "you want to fight," he said.

Canadians soldiers were "excited, but not nervous" in the days leading up to the invasion, he stated.

At the time, they did not know that the landing was almost called off because of poor weather but when a weather window opened on the morning of June 6, Gen. Dwight Eisenhower, the supreme commander of the Allied forces, gave the invasion a green light.

Goodman's unit was among the first Canadian forces to hit the beach, and they faced mostly small arms fire from the German defenders. As they fought their way inland, Goodman was conscious of his D-Day objective, a town about one mile inland where he was to hook up with another regiment.

A captain on D-Day, Goodman's tank lost a tread in a minefield before he commandeered a sergeant's vehicle and pressed on towards the unit's objective.

Goodman recalls that his tank would fire on German positions when they revealed themselves, and the toughest fighting came in occupied French towns when German soldiers rained down fire from the top floors of buildings. Goodman, who was promoted to major a few weeks after D-Day, was wounded twice in the battle for Normandy that followed the landings. The first time occurred when he was shot in the leg while outside his tank. After convalescing for a few weeks he rejoined his unit and was later hit in the other leg. He returned to action a few weeks later and recalls that he was one of the luckier ones. "I lost a lot of men in the war."

Eddie Goodman

* * *

Of all the battles fought by the western Allies during World War II, the D-Day invasion is one of the most well known. Immortalized in films such as The Longest Day and Steven Spielberg's acclaimed Saving Private Ryan, it marked the opening of the long-anticipated second front in Europe.

Following the German conquest of France in the spring/summer of 1940 and the British evacuation of its expeditionary force at Dunkirk, the bulk of the land fighting took part on the eastern front, where massive German and Soviet armies clashed in monumental battles.

In 1942, British forces stemmed the German advance in North Africa at El Alamein and began the long push to free the continent of Axis forces. In 1943, Allied troops from Britain, Canada and the United States invaded Sicily and followed that up with the invasion of mainland Italy.

Meanwhile, Soviet leader Josef Stalin urged the western Allies to launch an invasion of western Europe to take some of the pressure off the beleaguered Soviet army. Soviet troops barely stemmed the German invasion at the gates of Moscow in late 1941, and German units held most of Stalingrad until repulsed in an epic battle in late 1942 and early 1943 that many historians cite as a turning point in the war.

In August 1942, units of the 2nd Canadian Infantry Division took part in the raid on Dieppe, a heavily fortified port city in Normandy. Of 4,963 Canadian troops, 1,005 British commandos and 50 U.S. Rangers, 2,600 were killed or captured.

By the middle of 1944, Canadian troops in Britain were eager to see action. As part of the D-Day invasion plan, the 3rd Canadian Division was assigned a stretch of Normandy beach, code named Juno. On the Canadians' right and left flanks, British units were assigned beaches named Sword (to the east) and Gold (to the west). Further to the west, American troops came ashore at Omaha and Utah beaches.

Military planners had ambitious objectives for the Canadian assault. The 3rd Infantry Division, supported by the 2nd Canadian Armoured Brigade, was to head inland to the city Caen and even beyond to the airfield at Carpiquet, 11 miles from the coast.

They faced three battalions of the German 716th Division, with the 21st Panzer (tank) Division and the 12th SS Panzer Division nearby, ready to reinforce the coastal defenders.

The plan of attack was for the Royal Winnipeg Rifles, the Regina Rifles, the Queen's Own Rifles and the North Shores to be among the first wave, supported by the Fort Gary Horse and the 3rd Hussars (tank units) and the Canadian Scottish. In addition, the Régiment de la Chaudière and the Canadian Scots took part in the early stages of the invasion.

After meeting stiff resistance, Canadian forces pushed up from the beach. In July, they participated in the battle to take Caen and later in the summer, they were part of the battle to close the "Falaise Gap" and prevent the partially encircled German army from escaping near the town of Falaise.

By June 11, 1,017 Canadians had been killed in action and 1,814 wounded.

By late August, the Battle of Normandy had been won, but at considerable cost. The Canadian Army incurred 18,444 casualties, including more than 5,021 dead. The 3rd Division suffered greater losses than any other division within the 21st Army Group, while the 2nd Canadian Infantry Division, which arrived in France on July 7, incurred the next highest. All told, battle casualties slightly exceeded 3,000 in June, 5,500 in July, and 7,400 for the period Aug. 1 to 23, according to the CBC's The Valour and the Horror website.

D-Day display at city hall

The Jewish Canadian Military Archives will mount a display in the rotunda of Toronto City Hall to commemorate the 60th anniversary of D-Day.

The display, which will run from May 30 to June 6 (9 a.m. to 5 p.m.), will focus on the contributions of Jewish Canadians to the Canadian military during World War II. Jews served in the Canadian forces in greater percentage than any other ethnic group. "During World War II, there were 170,000 Canadian men, women and children of the Jewish faith in Canada, of which 17,000 proudly served in the four branches of Canada's armed forces," the archives organization states.

"The contributions of Jewish Canadian veterans to Canadian military history and to Canadian society are an important part of our heritage and future legacies, and must be recorded, preserved and displayed to the community at large," said Brigitte Levine, exhibit director and project coordinator for the archives organization.

The archives was established in 2000 and houses a collection of war memorabilia. It is also home to the Memorial Book of Remembrance which honours the more than 550 Jewish Canadians military personel who gave their lives during active duty.

The rotunda display is part of a number of events marking D-Day. On June 6, Nathan Phillips Square will host "Toronto Remembers D-Day, 1944," a series of activities that includes a commemorative ceremony at 2 p.m.

At 3 p.m., a "Toronto March of Remembrance" will proceed to Queen's Park from Nathan Phillips Square.

At 4 p.m. a "Grand Commemoration" will take place at Queen's Park.

Jewish war veterans recall D-day invasion

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In 1939, the year Canada joined Britain in declaring war on Germany, Arthur Robbins was 14 years old. Although Canada had developed a sterling military reputation during the Great War, the regular forces remained small. Still, Robbins loved "the pipes" and when war finally came, he was a drummer boy with the Black Watch Regiment in his native Montreal.

Two years later, still only 16, Robbins left home intent on joining a fighting unit. He travelled to Toronto where he planned to enlist in the Toronto Scottish Regiment. His parents got wind of his plans and phoned ahead to alert the recruiting officer. Turned down because of his age, Robbins was hitchhiking back to Montreal when he stopped in Kingston and decided to give his underage efforts another go. Presenting phony ID, Robbins was accepted into the Canadian forces, no questions asked. Joining the Stormont Dundas and Glengarry Regiment, composed of youths from eastern Ontario, Robbins soon found himself overseas in a basic training course in England.

Though being Jewish wasn't an impediment to his service, there were some in the unit who made life difficult, "but I straightened them out," he said.

At around the same time, Lionel Mernick was working in a lady's clothing factory on Spadina Avenue when "I got a letter, an invitation, to report to North Bay," he recalled.

"At the time, I was glad to get out of the factory" and he found he was quite adept at the military's training program. In fact, he was so successful he was asked to remain as an instructor of future recruits.

Many of the young soldiers, he learned, were Jewish kids. On Sundays, they were given the worst kind of duties at the time when the gentile soldiers strutted their stuff on "Parade Sunday."

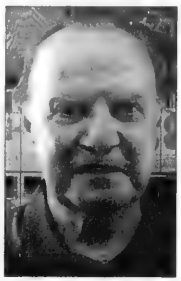
Lionel Mernick

Mernick, now 84, arranged for the Jewish soldiers to be given the opportunity to do the same, and the Army instituted the "Jewish Church Parade" involving some 20 to 25 recruits, later in the day on Sundays. The parade would culminate in a visit to a store on Orillia's main street owned by the Bader family. There, the boys would enjoy a little food and drink, he recalled.

Mernick remained a basic training instructor until 1943. "At the time, we heard scraps of news about what was happening to the Jews of Europe. It was suppressed, but we had a good idea."

Asking to be transferred overseas, he was initially placed with the Argyle and Sutherland Highlanders, but he found the unit quite cliquish. Instead, he asked to join the Queen's Own Rifles, a regiment with lots of Jewish lads, including his brother Gerald.

The regiment was made part of the 3rd Division (three regiments make up a brigade and three brigades make up a division) and was one of the first to hit the beach on D-Day.



Arthur Robbins

Mernick was attached to a field dressing unit that was on the Canadians' forward lines.

Before the war, Harold Goldman was a bugler in the Boys Club Band. Though only 16 in 1940, he remembers "a lot of kids were joining up."

Still too young to enlist, he joined the 48th Highlander Rotary Youth Training Club, a group that was supposed to receive military training but where the boys "marched, saluted and played basketball," he recalls.

At 18, Goldman entered service in the Royal Canadian Artillery and was trained by Mernick in Orillia.

In March 1944, he was sent overseas as a replacement and was assigned to the 12th Field Regiment, an artillery unit that he proudly states "was the first artillery regiment to open fire in Normandy on D-Day."

Sam Romberg, 81, was one of those underage youths eager to enlist and who was not completely forthright when giving his age. He was only 17 when he enlisted at a recruiting post on Bay and Front streets in Toronto. It was another case of no questions asked, and that same day he was on a truck to Camp Borden for basic training, he said.

He started his military service as a medical orderly, but quickly transferred to the 1st Hussars, a tank regiment that historically had been a cavalry unit.

Because of the shortage of working tanks, early training was done on trucks, motorcycles and by employing other tank stand-ins, he said.

He was transferred overseas in 1941, joining the 2nd Canadian Armored Brigade. His unit trained along the south coast of England until June 1944.

Murray Jacobs was working as a watchmaker for Peoples Credit Jewelers when the war began. "I joined because I felt that if the country was good enough to live in, it was good enough to fight for. And we knew what was happening against the Jews," he said.

He was sent overseas in January 1942 and was assigned to the 4th Armored Troop Workshop, a unit that consisted of mechanics and technicians responsible for maintaining and repairing everything from vehicles, tanks, guns, motors and watches to upholstery. It was one of only two such units in the Canadian army.

* * *

Early on D-Day, Robbins found himself at Southampton on the south shore of England. The invasion had already been postponed one day due to bad weather, but "we were all ready to go. We had spent two years training in assault landings," he said.

His unit boarded landing craft number 299, a vehicle whose number "is indelibly in my mind."

After a bumpy Channel crossing the forward ramp on the landing craft dropped down "and we went right to the beach, knee-deep in water.

"We were getting artillery fire, mortars, machine gun fire, sniper fire. We lost 48 men on the beach" out of a unit of about 170 soldiers, he said.

Despite the years of training, first combat is a frightening experience, Robbins continued. "The minute I heard those mortars and shells coming down and explosions that sound so terrible, my mouth just dried up. I never had that again. But you carry on because you're trained to carry on."

Mernick, whose unit hit the beach early that morning, said they were under orders to skip over German strong points when they could. "We had to keep going, so we just bypassed the thing. A few got hit on the beach, but the rest just fanned out as fast as we could."

"You know what saved us?" he said. "The training. Your feet knew where to go, not your brain. Even if you see some guys fall, you keep going."

Goldman recalls that his artillery unit came ashore after the infantry had advanced off the beach.

The weather was horrendous, he said. "I was sick all the way over."

Sam Romberg

The landing craft he was on carried several tanks and they were equipped with a "Mae West" flotation device to make sure the they didn't founder in the water when they disembarked.

The regiment landed around noon on "Mike Green," the code name for a stretch of beach whose French names might have confused the Anglo soldiers.

The unit was equipped with 25-pounder field guns/howitzers and the "Priest," a turretless self-propelled 105 mm gun in a tank body that "nobody liked. It was too cumbersome," he said.

Their orders were to break through the seawall and move ahead, not stand and fight. Luckily, the unit suffered no casualties that first day, he recalled.

Romberg was serving at headquarters when his unit, the 2nd Canadian Armoured Brigade, arrived in Normandy a few days after the invasion. He recalls that on the Channel voyage, the landing craft bumped into some mines, but they had been rendered harmless by frogmen, who prior to D-Day had surreptitiously removed their detonators.

Murray Jacobs

The regiment moved ahead quickly. "When we got to outside Caen and near the town of Ifs, the U.S. bombed the hell out of us. I got wounded there."

Despite stopping some shrapnel with his shoulder, Romberg does not appear angry at the friendly fire incident. Canadian pilots also bombed their unit in August, he pointed out, adding the army was moving so fast that pilots attacked areas thought to be controlled by German forces but which were occupied by Canadians.

Harold Goldman

After convalescing in France, Romberg rejoined his unit for the push north.

Jacobs' regiment didn't enter Normandy until June 10, but news filtering back to England was that "we were in a mess and were only one to 1¼ miles in from the beach and there were a lot of casualties."

When departing the landing craft, he recalls how a soldier ahead of him froze and could not obey orders to disembark. "No one knows how they will react when they're shooting at you," he said.

After driving the vehicle on shore the unit set up camp in an open area. On their second night in Normandy, the group was raided by German aircraft and "we lost 25 to 28 guys." Jacobs blames officers for not insisting the soldiers dig slit trenches to get them below ground to avoid the shrapnel and explosions of German bombs.

Jacobs recalls many soldiers didn't want to dig into the earth as just below the surface you could find hastily buried German soldiers.

How did they endure that sort of trauma?

"The key thing is, you're fighting for a cause and you were trained for a cause and you're young," Jacobs, 83, said.

"You're alive," added Robbins, now 79. "You're sorry about the guy who got killed, but 'I'm alive'.

"You also become very blasé."

The veterans believe Canadian troops acquitted themselves well – in fact, were among the toughest fighters in the Allied armies on D-Day and the fastest moving.

Canadians advanced so far beyond the British forces to the east and west, that their flanks were exposed, forcing them to pull back, they said.

Following D-Day, heavy fighting continued at the battle for Caen and at Falaise.

Later, Canadian troops fought their way north, cleared the Scheldt estuary, a key part of the battle to open the port of Antwerp to Allied shipping. They continued north through Belgium and liberated Holland, with some units ending the war in northern Germany.

To a man, the veterans, all members of the General Wingate Branch of the Royal Canadian Legion, say they are better treated by the Dutch than by their fellow Canadians. "Holland treats us like kings," said Mernick.

But when they look back at what they accomplished, they quickly dispel any notion they should be considered heroes. "I just did the job I was trained for," said Robbins.

"As Jews, you wanted to do your best and fight those bastards," added Jacobs.

PMO sources: No compromise on pullout plan

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Officials in the Prime Minister's Office said Sunday night there would be no compromise on Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's revised disengagement plan, despite Justice Minister Yosef Lapid's earlier announcement that he would work to get an agreement in the cabinet.

Lapid said Sunday he was trying to achieve an agreement between Sharon and Finance Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on the revised disengagement plan in an attempt to get it passed in the cabinet.

"I offer my services as an agent between the two so as to prevent the collapse of the government," Lapid said at the weekly cabinet meeting.

However, the PMO officials later said no talks were underway and there would be no compromise. They said the plan that would come to a vote would be the four-phase plan Sharon presented to the cabinet last week.

Under the plan, all settlements in the Gaza Strip and four in northern Samaria will be evacuated. The settlements earmarked for evacuation were divided into four groups and the dismantling of each group will be brought for cabinet approval separately.

The evacuation is slated for completion by the end of 2005.

The Likud faction in the Knesset will convene Monday to discuss the disengagement plan. The meeting is expected to be tense in the wake of the rift that deepened Sunday between Sharon and Netanyahu, who opposes the plan, and because the plan's opponents are insisting that all ministers and members of Knesset abide by the results of the May 2 party referendum that defeated Sharon's proposal for an Israeli withdrawal from the Gaza Strip.

Sharon told the cabinet Sunday that he was ready to fire ministers in order to pass the plan, and said holding the referendum had been a mistake.

Likud faction chair MK Gideon Sa'ar will decide Monday whether to give in to the demands of those opposing the plan and call for a vote on a bill approving the referendum results. Sa'ar is due to meet with Sharon before the faction meeting. Sharon plans to reiterate comments he made Sunday, according to which the interests of the country must supersede party interests.

Lapid said the Likud members' defeat of the pullout plan does not mean his Shinui party should stop supporting it. He said the positions of Sharon and Netanyahu must be brought closer, especially since the finance minister has agreed to the first stage of Sharon's revised plan, which calls for the removal of three isolated settlements in the Gaza Strip.

Lapid proposed a specific compromise to Netanyahu's aides outside the government meeting, according to which the government would decide on evacuating only the three settlements – Morag, Netzarim and Kfar Darom – and Sharon would tell the cabinet he intends to bring for approval his plan to dismantle all the settlements in the Gaza Strip.

Netanyahu's aides said the compromise would be carefully considered, adding that it was similar to a compromise proposal Netanyahu had previously brought.

Sharon warned the cabinet Sunday that he was willing to change the makeup of the coalition so as to pass the plan.

Speaking during the cabinet debate on the new version of his plan, Sharon warned that he was ready to take "unprecedented political steps," including the dismissal of ministers.

The prime minister has brought "an evacuation in stages" – the revised disengagement plan distributed to ministers Friday – to the cabinet despite the fact that only 11 ministers were in favour, while 12 ministers opposed the initiative.

"I am determined to pass this plan, even if I am forced to change the make-up of the government or to take unprecedented political steps," Sharon said.

The prime minister decided to present the "graduated plan" after failing to obtain Netanyahu's support for the overall plan.

Netanyahu is firm in his objections, as are Education Minister Limor Livnat, Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom and Health Minister Dan Naveh.

Netanyahu's objections to the plan drew criticism from Sharon, but, referring to the Likud referendum, Netanyahu said, "A month ago there was a Likud vote and we must honour it. If there is democracy, it binds all of us."

Sharon said, however, that the good of the Israeli public must take precedence over that of Likud members.

"In the conflict between the duty toward the entire public and the duty to Likud registered members, we have no choice. We must prefer the good of the general public, we must approve the plan."

Likud central committee members called on Sharon to adhere to the results of the party referendum. The committee members said the Likud would disintegrate if the referendum results were not honoured and that 2,000 members have signed a petition calling on Sharon to accept the poll results.

Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon reviewed before the cabinet the security implications of the plan. "Failure to decide signifies a diplomatic freeze, which could encourage Palestinian extremists," he said.

Shin Bet chief Avi Dichter said withdrawing from Gaza would lead to a reduction in the number of terror attacks, and Fatah would not allow Hamas to take control of areas evacuated by Israel.

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz on Sunday supported the prime minister's plan, telling Israel Radio that remaining in Gaza would not advance Israeli security.

Vanunu: Exposing Israel's nuclear secrets was not betrayal

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — In his first interview since his release last month after 18 years in jail for revealing Israel's nuclear secrets to a British newspaper, Mordechai Vanunu told the BBC in an interview aired Sunday night that he did not feel he was a traitor to the country.

"I felt it was not about betraying; it was about reporting. It was about saving Israel from a new holocaust," he said. Speaking to the BBC's This World program, Vanunu said he had "no regrets, despite the fact I have paid a heavy punishment, a large price."

"What I did was to inform the world what is going on in secret," he said. "I didn't come and say 'We should destroy Israel, we should destroy Dimona.' I said, look what they have and make your judgement."

The interview sparked controversy in Israel ahead of its airing, after the British journalist making the program, Peter Hounam, was arrested by the Shin Bet security service on suspicion of violating Vanunu's terms of release, which include a ban on meetings with foreigners.

The interview was facilitated by an Israeli, Yael Lotan, thereby bypassing the ban.

Days before his 1986 exposé of Israel's nuclear capability appeared in the Sunday Times, Vanunu was seized by Israeli agents from an apartment in Italy, where he had been lured by a female agent nicknamed "Cindy."

The BBC program also included comments by Justice Minister Yosef Lapid, who argued that Vanunu still posed a threat to Israel's security.

"We think he still knows secrets and we don't want him to sell them again," Lapid told This World.

"We think there are things he knows that he hasn't divulged yet. He may do so – he's hell-bent to harm this country. He hates this country."

The arrest of Hounam and the apparent smuggling of the Vanunu interview to London have sparked more tensions between Israel and the BBC.

Foreign Ministry officials charge that the BBC is a "communications organization whose goal is to undermine the legitimacy of the state of Israel. It promotes hostile coverage of Israel… and the Vanunu affair proves that the BBC is a communications entity which shows complete disregard for journalistic standards and ethics. Their journalistic culture can be compared to that of media outlets in Arab states, or in the Palestinian Authority."

One Foreign Ministry source said the ministry will now reevaluate Israel's relations with the BBC. Israel had boycotted the BBC for five months leading up to November 2003.

The ministry is furious about what it regards as the BBC's shirking of responsibility for the Vanunu interview.

"The BBC baldly lied to us after Vanunu's release," the ministry official said. "It lied when it denied having any connection with the apartment which was about to be rented for him in Jaffa. Hounam worked for the BBC, and they are simply lying on this matter."

The same ministry official charged that the BBC failed to submit the recorded interview to Israeli censors, even though it is obliged to do so under Israeli law. The BBC's official statement about this charge is that the film of Vanunu was produced by an independent outfit, Magnetic North, for the BBC.

Speaking on the condition of anonymity, BBC representatives unleashed a series of counter-charges.

"It's not true that we lied," they said. "Hounam has never worked for the BBC. He works for the Sunday Times and for a private company that sold us the film, and what he does as an independent journalist is of no concern to us."

IDF warns Syria

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Maj.-Gen. Benny Gantz, the head of the Israeli army's Northern Command, has warned Syria that it would pay a "heavy price" for any escalation in Hezbollah activity along the Israel-Lebanon border.

In an interview with Channel 2 television that aired Saturday afternoon, Gantz said that under the presidency of Bashar Assad, Syria has greatly strengthened its ties to Hezbollah and is directly transferring weapons to the terrorist group, which it allows to operate freely in Lebanon.

Although Hezbollah has kept the border area relatively quiet since Israel left south Lebanon in May 2000, that could change at any time, Gantz said.

"Assad is taking a risk, which could blow up in his face, [because] if we reach the situation where we clash, we won't be looking at just Hezbollah," he said.

Syria is investing in the guerrilla group as a way of continuing "the struggle with us without physically fighting," Gantz added.

When asked about the possibility of a strike on Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah, Gantz replied: "Nothing is impossible. It is advisable for him not to sleep too soundly."

In October 2003, Israeli warplanes struck targets near Damascus after an Islamic Jihad suicide bombing at a Haifa restaurant that killed 21 people.

The targeted area was later identified by the Israel Defence Forces as a training camp that had served fighters recruited by a host of groups, including Islamic Jihad, Hamas and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

IDF pulls out of Rafah

Israel Defence Forces troops completed their pullout from the southern Gaza refugee camp of Rafah last week. Troops left the Tel Sultan and Brazil neighbourhoods, lifted the siege north of Rafah and renewed traffic flow to other parts of the strip. IDF Gaza division commander Brig.-Gen. Shmuel Zakai said the army killed 41 terrorists and demolished 56 Palestinian homes during its incursion.

Madonna cancels Israel tour

Pop superstar Madonna recently cancelled concerts scheduled in Israel as a result of death threats by unknown Palestinians, the British tabloid the Sun reported last week. The singer had scheduled three concerts for September in Tel Aviv. According to the report, she cancelled the dates when she received letters containing detailed information about her two children, aged 7 and 3.

Too early to clear Sharon

Israel's Justice Ministry denied reports that the nation's top prosecutor has decided to clear Prime Minister Ariel Sharon in a corruption case. After Israeli media reported that Attorney General Menachem Mazuz likely would close the case against Sharon, the Justice Ministry said a decision is still pending. Mazuz is expected to decide by June 15 whether to indict Sharon in connection with a case in which a businessman is suspected of trying to bribe him in exchange for help in buying a Greek island resort.

PA officials use deception

Palestinian Authority officers posed as sick patients to infiltrate Israel in fake ambulances, Israeli police said. Some of the officials are members of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's security guards, the police said. The police added that some terrorists also may have been smuggled into Israel using this method.

Shrine of the Book reopens

The Shrine of the Book in Jerusalem is reopening. The Jerusalem museum housing the Dead Sea Scrolls is due to open in June after undergoing repairs for more than a year. The texts, more than 2,000 years old and written in Aramaic and Hebrew, were discovered between 1947 and 1956 in 11 caves near the Dead Sea.

Israeli wine guide soon

A guide to Israeli wine-making is due out this summer. Daniel Rogov, wine critic for Ha'aretz, wrote the first guide to both kosher and non-kosher Israeli wines, which is to be published by Toby Press in August. The guide covers the recent blossoming of the Israeli wine industry, reviewing more than 1,000 wines from both large and boutique wineries.

European Jews confer, plan future

By RUTH ELLEN GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUDAPEST — European Jews are struggling to find an effective way to assert their identity and articulate a coherent, collective voice in a rapidly changing Europe.

This challenge, European Jewish leaders say, is breaking stereotypes and fostering a positive sense of self-definition in the face of looming challenges that have put recent optimistic models of Jewish integration to the test.

"One of the biggest challenges we have is to get Jews generally and the world at large to recognize that we are not just defined by the three elements of anti-Semitism, the Holocaust and defence of Israel," said Jonathan Joseph, the incoming president of the European Council of Jewish Communities.

"It is obvious that 90 per cent of our lives is not defined by these elements, but 90 per cent of our image is," Joseph said. "I cannot sit and watch while we define ourselves and allow the world to define us in just those terms."

Joseph was elected president of the European Council of Jewish Communities at the conclusion of the third General Assembly of European Jewry, a three-day shmooze-fest held in Budapest on May 20 to May 23 that gathered a record number of Jews from across Europe.

Sponsored by the European Council of Jewish Communities and the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, the G.A. provided an opportunity for more than 1,000 Jewish activists from more than 40 countries to party, network and assert their commitment to the ideal of a European Jewish identity.

Delegates came from all walks of life and ranged in age from students to octogenarians.

They converged on Budapest from established communities in Western Europe and from tiny outposts in post-Communist states – and from every type of community in between. There were even Jews there from Malta and Kosovo.

"It's been a real opportunity for communities in Europe – especially in a Europe that is trying to unite, expand and grow – to get together, get to know each other and start generating joint activities," said Zdravko Sami, the president of the 208-member Jewish community of Macedonia. "For small communities like us, it's really important."

But a series of uncertainties cast a shadow on the otherwise exuberant celebration. These included external questions, such as the impact on Europe's Jews of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Islamic fundamentalism and international terrorism, which all have become acute since the last European G.A., held in Madrid in 2001.

Indeed, Israeli author A.B. Yehoshua shook up the conference with an appeal for European Jews to take the lead in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, calling on them to help draw the new border between Israel and a Palestinian state.

He called U.S. policy in the Middle East "useless" and chastised European countries for not having played a more active role in helping settle conflicts such as the Balkan wars of the 1990s.

Conference participants also focused on deep-seated internal challenges, such as articulating a coherent Jewish voice in Europe, strengthening European Jewish leadership, evaluating a Jewish role in European affairs – and even defining whether a European Jewish identity really exists.

"Are European and Jewish interests compatible?" Paris-based historian Diana Pinto, long a champion of asserting a European Jewish identity in Europe, asked delegates. "In the past four years, a feeling has emerged that the answer is no. Some forces in the Jewish world think that Europe is tone deaf, and even inimical."

But, she said in an interview, part of the blame lies with Jewish leaders who are unable to get a clear message across even to sympathetic non-Jewish interlocutors.

"Back in the 1930s, the Jewish leaders in Europe were capable of formulating Jewish needs and concerns but had no one to speak to," Pinto said. "But now, when there are so many ears open to Jewish concerns, I sometimes feel that the leadership seems only capable of mumbling."

The Budapest gathering took place just three weeks after the European Union expanded eastward to embrace Malta, Cyprus and eight former Communist countries, including Hungary.

Holding the meeting in Budapest was a deliberate recognition that the Cold War divide that for decades had split Europe – and Europe's Jews – no longer exists.

But European Jews are looking forward to the effects of EU expansion with a mixture of eagerness and anxiety. And the conflicting emotions, combined with worry over anti-Semitism and the continuing conflict in the Middle East, had an noticeable impact on the G.A.s atmosphere.

"We are looking at a politically united Europe for the first time ever," Joseph told delegates. "We are experiencing a reawakening of Jewish life and culture in Europe on a scale not seen for 100 years."

At the same time, he said, "We are living at a most delicate moment in global Jewish terms, with the Middle East in turmoil again, an intermingling of anti-Zionism with anti-Semitism and the physical manifestation of this uncomfortably close to us. How we respond over the next few years will be one of the most significant things we will do as a Jewish people, and particularly as a European Jewish people."

"Anti-Semitism will never disappear," Joseph said. "But the best antidote to anti-Semitism is a positive presence of Jews. Jews have got to stand tall – and never have we had such an opportunity to do so."

A number of participants said that despite pledges by European Jewish leaders to develop a strong Jewish voice, the G.A. appeared to be inward-looking – to the point where one Italian delegate spoke of a "self-ghettoization."

"We are turning inward," she said. "The threats from outside are making people wary. We see families who want to put their children into Jewish schools because they are afraid to have them sit next to the children of Muslim immigrants in public schools."

The European Council of Jewish Communities, funded in large part by the JDC, is a service organization that aims to facilitate co-operation and communication among Jewish communities and organizations, as well as to promote initiatives fostering Jewish culture and heritage, Jewish education, social welfare and communal development.

A new mission statement prepared for the G.A. stressed that it also aims to represent Jewish interests at EU headquarters in Brussels on issues that could affect Jewish communities.

These issues include moves in some countries to limit or ban Jewish ritual practices, such as kosher slaughter and ritual circumcision, on the grounds of animal or children's rights.

They also include ensuring Jewish input in the promotion of civil society and democratic ideals in the new Europe.

Henry Grunwald, president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, warned that as European citizens, Europe's Jews must define their own identities in positive terms and must resist the temptation to circle the wagons.

"If we don't," he said, "we risk falling into the trap of letting ourselves be defined by our attackers, by anti-Semitism."

"We must be proud to be Jews, be confident to be Jews," he said. "Let's not make the mistake of thinking that everyone out there is out enemy. We have many friends, and we are not doing our job if we don't go out there and keep up our friendships and make new ones."

Father and daughter leave Canada to serve in IDF

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — As far back as Torontonian Lisa Lidor can remember, Israel has been a part of her consciousness.

"My family has always been very connected to Israel," says the 22-year-old, who estimates she has been to visit family there more than 12 times in her life.

Although Lidor was born in Toronto, her father Dov was born in Israel to parents who fled there from Poland in 1936. Dov met Lisa's mother Marilyn, who is from Ottawa, while she was studying at the University of Tel Aviv. The couple married in Israel and moved to Canada in 1975, settling in Thornhill before starting a family.

When Dov decided to return to Israel to volunteer for 24 days of army reserve duty two years ago, Lisa realized she wanted to follow in her father's footsteps.

"When my dad decided to go to Israel to join the reserves, he just came down to the dinner table one night and said, 'I booked my flight,'" Lisa recalls. "No one argued, because when it comes to helping Israel, it's not an issue that's up for discussion."

Dov learned about the volunteer reserve program on the Israel Defence Forces' website.

"The IDF was looking for volunteers to help regular army soldiers at roadblocks and patrols where they need mature soldiers who are experienced in handling the Palestinian civilian population," explains 53-year-old Dov, who fought in the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

"Being from Israel and living abroad, you always have the feeling that you are not doing enough," he says. "So here was an opportunity to do something to help."

Lisa was inspired by her father's commitment. When she returned from a trip to Israel with the University of Toronto chapter of Hillel after her first semester of studies, she told her family she intended to enlist in the IDF.

"My dad just looked at me and said, 'Why did you come all the way home? Now, I have to buy you a ticket to go back!'" recalls Lisa. "That's the attitude my family had about it, because we understand that as Jews, even if we live abroad, Israel is our place and we would never tell each other 'No' when it comes to Israel."

In December 2002, almost a year after declaring her intentions, Lisa entered basic training. "I did a special basic training for new immigrants," she explains, saying that after taking only a first-level language course at U of T, she had a lot of Hebrew to learn.

"At the very beginning, the biggest challenge was the Hebrew, because people would talk to me and I had no idea what was going on," she says.

"After the language barrier, the biggest challenge was being in Israel and being alone. To be a lone soldier when everyone else goes home on the weekend to their families is really hard."

Lisa Lidor and her father Dov

According to Lisa, who joined the air force after basic training, another challenge involved finding out who were her true friends and who were not.

"Only my Jewish friends have kept in touch with me," she says with disappointment. "A lot of people who I thought were my friends don't write and don't call, and I think it's because they don't support my decision to be here."

Lisa says anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment are increasingly prominent in Canada.

"Things have changed. We have a huge problem now," she says.

"My whole first year, I don't think anyone in my class knew I was Jewish. It wasn't until the last day of class that I wore a Magen David charm to class and someone in my political science class said, 'What are you, a Jew?' and I just said, 'Yes, I am.' It went silent in the class for a minute, and the teaching assistant didn't want to get into it. It was awkward.

"With that awareness, came the awareness that I had to be part of Hillel and I had to attend pro-Israel rallies because no one else was going to go," she adds, saying there is a lack of support for Israel among Jewish students.

Dov, who is in Israel for another round of volunteer service, says he also had a first-hand encounter with anti-Semitism in Toronto. When he returned from reserve duty the first time, he was fired from his job of 19 years.

He settled out of court for two years severance. "It was a clear case of anti-Semitism, although they would never admit to that."

He says the experience was a wake-up call.

"The word 'Zionism' is slowly disappearing from our vocabulary and it needs to come back if we want to ensure the future of the State of Israel. A lot of Jews take it for granted that Israel is here, but I do not take its existence for granted," he says.

He says not enough Israelis living in Canada return to do reserve duty.

"For Jews who can't come and serve in the army, they can do lots of other things for Israel," he says, naming fundraising and vacationing in Israel among the options available to Jews in Canada.

"[Canadian Jews] have to be united. We are too divided right now," he says. "I know that there is division in Israel. But, in North America we can't afford to have that. Jews who live abroad should be unconditionally supportive of Israel."

Although Lisa says she plans to move to Israel eventually, she wants to return to U of T to finish her studies after she completes her service in six months. "It has been the biggest adventure of my life," she says. "But, when I finish, it will have been 2½ years that I have been alone and I want to go home and be with my family for a bit."

Until then, father and daughter are spending as much time together as they can. "What we're hoping to accomplish is to encourage Israelis living abroad to come here to do their duty for the IDF and for Jewish people in Canada to be more supportive of Israel," Dov says.

"I don't think it's important what you do or how you do it, just that you do it. Jewish people need to support Israel. This is the time. There is never a better time than now."

Report: Iran establishes unit to recruit suicide bombers

By YOAV STERN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran has set up a new unit to recruit suicide bombers from around the world, the London-based Arabic newspaper A-Shark al-Awsat reported last week.

According to the report, the secretary-general of the new unit began by drawing up a list of names of people who support suicide attacks in Iraq, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories.

The newspaper reported that the bureau, called "The martyrs of the resurrection of the Islamic world," replaces a unit of the Iranian Republican Guard that was known as the "department for the revolutionary freedom movements."

The report says those behind the establishment of the unit are extremist Islamists members of the Iranian regime who are opposed to the moderate steps taken by President Mohammed Khatami.

Hollinger Group fires Jerusalem Post CEO

By ANAT BALINT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Hollinger International, the owner of the Jerusalem Post, fired the paper's publisher and CEO Thomas Rose last week after months of turmoil for Israel's first English-language daily.

The decision to fire Rose comes ahead of the expected sale of the newspaper in the coming weeks and may indicate a dramatic change in direction for the paper, which has had a dedicated right-wing slant for a decade.

Mark Ziman, the Post's chief financial officer, has replaced Rose, although the appointment is expected to be temporary until a buyer is found for the paper.

Two groups in the running to buy the paper are the Israeli-American media giant Haim Saban, and the Canadian media organization CanWest, founded by the late Jewish Canadian media magnate Izzy Asper and run by his sons, David and Leonard.

Rose's termination comes after his six years as publisher of the Post, which have been marked by endless conflicts with senior editors and journalists, especially after Bret Stephens joined the paper as editor-in-chief two years ago.

Last week, Stephens met with the interim CEO of the Hollinger group, Gordon Paris, and briefed him on the situation at the paper, after which Rose was given notice.

Changes at the Post come against the background of the shock waves at Hollinger International, which is now up for sale. The crisis began in November, after Hollinger uncovered financial irregularities and brought its audit committee into a special probe of the company.

The Toronto-based and NYSE-listed company was already under fire from shareholders for its complex corporate structure and executive compensation. Hollinger CEO Conrad Black resigned in November and the company removed him as chairman in January.

In March, he was stripped of his post as chairman at the British Telegraph Group, whose papers include the Daily Telegraph, the Sunday Telegraph and the Spectator magazine.

Rose said last week he was sure Ziman would deal successfully with the challenges at the Post.

Amotz Asael, the acting editor of the Post, said people at the paper view Rose's departure as the end of six traumatic years and look forward to a new era of financial, political and psychological stability.

Cabbages

"I'm so nervous, Saul! I've never eaten at the rabbi's house before."

"Jacob, what are you afraid of? Rabbi Akiva has been our teacher for years now. You're close with him."

"But still, I feel...oh, I don't know. I guess you're right."

Saul and Jacob continued down the cobblestone road that led to Rabbi Akiva's house, accompanied by around 50 other students.

"Jacob!" rang out a voice behind them. Jacob turned around, and saw Azarya, another student in their class. "I've never been to the Rabbi's before," he said excitedly. "I can't wait! Is this your first time too?"

"Yes, it is."

"My older brother told me that the food there is amazing. And the house itself! It's a virtual palace!"

"Are you serious? Wow, I can't wait either," said Jacob enthusiastically. "The food had better be as good as you say. I'm really hungry."

"That's what you're going for? Food?" demanded Saul incredulously. "MY brother told ME that as wonderful as the food is, the 'words of wisdom the rabbi says after the meal are the crown of the evening.' You know what else he told me? 'Just watching the rabbi eat is in itself a lesson in politeness.'"

"OK, I didn't say I'm NOT going for that too. How soon will we be there?"

"That's his house right there."

"Really? That house? You're right, it does look a palace!" gasped Jacob. "In fact, it IS a palace!"

"Not so loud, the rabbi might hear you."

Rabbi Akiva stood in the doorway, welcoming his students. "Leave your coats over there," he directed, and led the way into the dining room.

Jacob gaped in awe at the high-ceilinged chamber, lavishly decorated with ornate draperies and beautiful tapestries. The large table in the middle seemed dwarfed by the immensity of it all. The students washed their hands and silently took their places at the table.

Servants brought in trays of bread. Jacob ate only a little. He was waiting for the good stuff he had been promised.

The servants reappeared, bearing plates of...cabbage? Cabbage?

Jacob couldn't believe it. And it wasn't even fully cooked! The outside was soft enough to eat, but the inner part was so tough he couldn't even cut off a piece.

Saul looked surprised too. After futilely trying to cut his cabbage, he resigned himself to a meal of bread.

Bread? thought Jacob. That's all I'm going to have tonight? He decided to try cutting the cabbage again. It was a hopeless endeavour.

Then he noticed some other students gnawing on their cabbage. Hey, that's a good idea! realized Jacob. He picked up the cabbage and tried to bite off a chunk.

"My sons," laughed Rabbi Akiva. "That's not the way to eat raw cabbage! For maximum leverage, you're going to have to stomp on it while you bite!"

Jacob dropped his cabbage, humiliated.

Rabbi Akiva snapped his fingers. Once again the servants entered, but this time they were bent under the weight of huge trays of roasted lamb.

Jacob forgot his embarrassment as he started to eat, discovering to his delight that the meat was fully cooked.

Rabbi Akiva's eyes twinkled. "I'm sorry if I embarrassed some of you. I just wanted to make sure all my students know how to eat like civilized human beings. Well, at least you do now!"

Rabbi Akiva was born in Israel about 2,000 years ago to a poor family that had converted to Judaism. Although he didn't learn to read until he was 40 years old, he immersed himself in study for many years, and became the greatest Torah scholar of his time. This story was adapted from Derech Eretz Rabbah 7.

We hear God's word in many ways

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Everybody knows that animals can't talk. At least, real ones can't. It's fun to hear them speak, argue and sing in movies and books, though, isn't it?

Artists can make animals talk for pretend, but sometimes, it seems, God can really do it.

The Angel and the Donkey, by Katherine Paterson with illustrations by Alexander Koshkin (Clarion Books, 1996), tells the story of a donkey belonging to a soothsayer (that's like a fortune teller) named Balaam, who lived in a city called Pethor. When someone wanted to wish for good luck for himself or for someone else, or for bad luck for an enemy, he called for Balaam.

Balaam would come with his donkey, and for a fee (it was his job, you see), he would do what you wanted him to.

At the time of the story, the Israelites had escaped from Egypt where they had been slaves (you remember the story from the Haggadah that we read on Pesach). They were wandering in the desert, when they came near the land of Moab.

The king of Moab was a very powerful king, but when he heard that the Israelites, led by Moses, were coming near and would demand safe passage through his country, he panicked.

He decided to call Balaam to curse them, so that his army would be able to defeat them.

Although Balaam had a dream in which an angel warned him that God didn't want him to curse the Israelites, he decided (for a very large fee) to go anyway.

Balaam started off on his trip, riding on his donkey. Suddenly, the donkey, who had always been co-operative and obedient, started to act up. He kept swerving off the path, squeezed Balaam against a wall, and finally sat down and refused to move.

The soothsayer kept beating him with a stick, but nothing helped. All of a sudden, the donkey started talking. As you can imagine, Balaam was a little surprised. The donkey showed him that an angel, the same one who had appeared in Balaam's dream, was "guarding the narrow passage with a great flaming sword in his hand."

The angel ordered Balaam to go to the king, but only to say what God told him to.

Instead of the curses Balak wanted from him, Balaam could only bless the Israelites. In fact, the angel said, "Blessed is everyone who blesses them, and cursed is everyone who curses them."

Needless to say, Balak was absolutely furious, especially when Balaam said, "Behold, a star shall rise out of Jacob, and a sceptre shall rise out of Israel. It shall crush the boundaries of Moab." That's not the kind of thing a king likes to hear.

The colours and pictures in this book are wonderful – strong reds and greens and blues, and more delicate browns and earth tones. The angel is especially beautiful, in bright gold, scarlet and yellow.

Balaam had a dream in which an angel warned him that God didn't want him to curse the Israelites

Documentary recounts the life of great photojournalist Robert Capa

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Robert Capa was a crack photojournalist, one of the best of the best, and this year marks the 50th anniversary of his untimely death.

Capa's stark, dispassionate, velvety photographs of pre-war Berlin and Paris, of the Spanish Civil War and of the battles of World War II and the Arab-Israeli conflict, set the gold standard.

Steven Spielberg said he had Capa in mind when he was plotting out pivotal scenes for Saving Private Ryan, his powerful movie about the 1944 Allied invasion of Nazi-occupied France.

Capa, whose technical skills and esthetic sensibilities were on a par with those of the renowned French photographer Henri Cartier Bresson, is the subject of Anne Makepeace's intriguing biopic and celebration of his relatively brief life, Robert Capa: In Love and War. It will be aired by TVOntario on June 10 at 10 p.m.

Born in Budapest as Andre Friedman, Capa left Hungary to 1930 to pursue a newspaper reporting career in Berlin. A leftist, his goal was "to fight fascism with words."

He arrived in Berlin desperately poor, with nothing more than a camera and a surfeit of hope in his possession. He did not become a reporter, but through sheer persistence, he landed a job with Dephot, the famous newsreel company.

On his first assignment, Capa's strongly vertical photographs of Leon Trotsky, the banished Soviet politician, were widely published. But his career in Germany fizzled when the Nazis assumed power.

Fleeing to Paris, Capa found himself at a loss. No one would hire him. His girlfriend, Gerda Taro, a Jewish refugee from Germany, found a practical solution. She submitted his photographs under an assumed name: Robert Capa. The inference seems to be that, with a surname like Friedman, he had no chance of success.

The ploy worked. Capa was soon in demand. "It's like being reborn," he wrote his beloved mother.

Capa's iconic photograph of a soldier toppling backwards after being fatally shot during a battle in the Spanish Civil War established him once and for all.

In the next few years, Capa covered the Japanese invasion of China, the German bombing of London and the Allied campaigns in Sicily, Tunisia and France. Appearing in Life magazine, his riveting photographs highlighted mud, misery and death.

Robert Capa accompanied the first wave of American soldiers on the beaches of Normandy.

Personally courageous, Capa accompanied the first wave of American troops who stormed Omaha Beach in Normandy and parachuted into the Rhine Valley with a group of intrepid commandos.

For Capa, the most important moment of the war was the liberation of Paris in the summer of 1944.

He was 32.

Capa, a confirmed bachelor, had a steamy affair with the sultry Swedish actress Ingrid Bergman soon after the war. When he met her, she had just won an Academy Award for her performance in George Cukor's Gaslight.

According to Bergman's daughter, Isabella, she was ready to marry Capa at the drop of a hat. But he was not "the marrying kind." And besides, he loathed Hollywood's artifice.

In 1947, Capa and a few associates formed the Magnum Agency. Its photographs were published far and wide and burnished Capa's reputation as a craftsman of the first degree.

Capa, having lost relatives and friends during the Holocaust, turned up in Tel Aviv to record the British departure from Palestine and David Ben-Gurion's declaration of Israeli statehood. Done with that, he produced a series of expressive photographs of Jews battling Arabs in the Negev.

Toward the close of his stay in Israel, a bullet pierced his thigh during a skirmish in Tel Aviv. He promised himself he would never again cover another war, but this was just rhetoric.

Capa's fortunes declined when the United States, at the height of the McCarthyist hysterics, withdrew his passport, making it impossible for him to travel abroad on assignments. Capa, having gone to the Soviet Union for a magazine, was accused of being a Communist sympathizer.

Retaining the services of a smart, expensive lawyer, he managed to extricate himself from this mess.

In 1954, breaking a promise to himself, he travelled to Vietnam to cover the war there. During a routine patrol with the French army, he strayed off a well-marked path and stepped on a land mine. He thereby became the first U.S. war correspondent to be killed in Vietnam.

Capa left behind a portfolio of 70,000 negatives – indelible, imperishable photographs of times and places history has not forgotten.

In the annals of commercial photography, he was clearly a giant.

Lachan choir presents early Hebrew art music

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Rarely performed music from the 12th to the early 19th century will be featured at "Baroque & Beyond," a concert presented by Lachan, Toronto's Jewish chamber choir June 8, 8 p.m., at Leah Posluns Theatre in the Bathurst JCC, 4588 Bathurst St.

"This concert is a celebration of early Hebrew art music," says Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple, conductor and music director of the Lachan choir, which was formed in 1993 by a group of experienced, Toronto-based musicians.

Maissner says there is a relatively small area between Rome and Milan and between Genoa and Venice, where "from the 14th century through the 16th century, there was an efflorescence of genius, of vitality and versatility, coupled with a universality of esthetic expression such as the world has perhaps never known at any other time. This dazzling process was the Italian Renaissance."

During this period, this area was the seat of numerous Jewish communities. In a liberal atmosphere, he notes, Jews were affected in an exceptional degree by the prevailing literary, artistic and humanistic tendencies. This had an influence on the music of this period.

One of the Jewish musical figures of the Renaissance period was Salamone Rossi, violinist and composer at the court of Mantua from 1587 to 1628.

Some 200 years later, Baron de Rothschild, on a trip to Italy, stumbled on a strange collection of old music books bearing the name Salamone Rossi Hebreo. He handed the music over to the cantor of the Great Synagogue of Paris, and in 1876, the first modern edition of Rossi's music was published.

Other composers represented at the upcoming concert include Abraham Cassares, Louis Saladin and Carlos Grossi.

Nadia Adler, pianist, arranger and editor, will accompany the choir. Adler, who came to Toronto in 1990, has worked with Lachan since its inception. She holds a master's degree in musicology and journalism from the Moscow Conservatory.

Also on the program will be Nota Bene, a 10-piece orchestra that will use authentic Baroque instruments. Based in Kitchener-Waterloo, Nota Bene performs exclusively with period instruments under the direction of Dan Zondervan.

Soloists performing the early Hebrew art music will be Cantor Gershon Silins of Temple Sinai and Cantor Anna Trubashnik of Temple Emanuel. Bassoonist David Klausner, who has played with the Toronto Symphony and Montreal Symphony orchestras, will be featured. He is an English professor at the University of Toronto and the director of the university's centre for medieval studies.

Ben Steinberg, composer, conductor and lecturer, and the composer-in-residence at Temple Sinai, will narrate the concert and provide the background information about this unique period in the history of Jewish composers.

Tickets are $25. For more information about the concert or to purchase tickets, call 416-782-3241 or e-mail www.lachan.org.

'Lapsed Catholic' wins Jewish Book prize

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Many novelists write fiction as though it were thinly disguised autobiography, said Kate Taylor, author of Mme. Proust and the Kosher Kitchen, as she accepted the Martin and Beatrice Fischer fiction prize and a $1,000 cheque last week at the Jewish Book Awards ceremony in North York.

"That's how I came, as a lapsed Catholic, to be writing a novel about Jews and Protestants," said the Toronto-based author, who is a Globe and Mail arts writer currently on maternity leave.

Since the novel has numerous Jewish characters, including the mother of French writer Marcel Proust, Taylor told The CJN one of her biggest challenges was to accurately depict Jewish customs and the Jewish community of postwar Toronto, where the book is partially set.

"It was very important for me to get that right, obviously, and recognition with a Jewish book award is a wonderful confirmation that I did get that right," she said.

A total of nine awards were handed out during the ceremony, which filled the Leah Posluns Theatre almost to capacity. As a highlight, Toronto author-journalist Arlene Perly Rae read a section from Taylor's novel dealing with problems around home-catering a kosher wedding.

At a catered reception afterwards, audience members schmoozed with authors and got them to autograph copies of their books.

"It was very nice," said Montreal journalist Joel Yanofsky, who won the biography/memoir prize for Mordecai & Me: An Appreciation of a Kind (Red Deer Press). "I spoke with people who had met Mordecai Richler and had anecdotes to tell about him."

As in previous years, Holocaust themes dominated the evening. Five of the nine winning titles, including two aimed specifically at young readers, deal specifically with some aspect or aspects of the Shoah.

Lillian Boraks-Nemetz and Irene N. Watts won the Yad Vashem Holocaust studies prize for editing Tapestry of Hope: Holocaust Writing for Young People (Tundra). Yad Vashem representative Dr. Joel Dimitry praised the anthology as "an extraordinary tapestry of writing" that was equally accessible to non-Jewish and Jewish children.

The prize in Holocaust literature went to Ruth Mandel for her book of poetry, How to Tell Your Children About the Holocaust (McGilligan), which is also geared for young readers.

As MC Adam Fuerstenberg explained, its title initially gave members of the awards committee the wrong impression about its contents.

"When we first saw this book, we said, 'We don't have a category for how-to books or for psychology,'" he said. "But when we opened it, each of us was deeply moved by it."

The prize in children's literature went to Aubrey Davis for his popular volume Bagels From Benny (Kids Can Press). The award was sponsored by The Canadian Jewish News, a first-time sponsor of the Jewish Book Awards.

The Holocaust memoir prize went to Henry G. Schogt for The Curtain: Witness and Memory in Wartime Holland (Wilfrid Laurier University Press).

MICHAEL BURGESS, ZEMMER SINGERS & ISRAELI HEROES HEADLINE BEIT HALOCHEM CONCERT, JUNE 3

"A Celebration of Life," the annual benefit concert for Beit Halochem Canada, features Israeli Heroes, the Zemmer Singers and special guest Michael Burgess. Proceeds go to aid disabled veterans of Israel. Tickets $50 and $100. Toronto Centre for the Arts, Main Hall, 5040 Yonge St., North York. Thursday, June 3, 7:30 p.m. 416-787-8950.

Bloomsday Centenary: Devotees of Ulysses will be "re-Joycing" this month at the 100th anniversary of Leopold Bloom's fictitious pub crawl through Dublin on the weekend of June 16, 1904, in the famous novel by James Joyce. Several events have been organized in Toronto to celebrate the occasion.

In "Bloom's Dublin – Bloomusalem," raconteur Theo Garb, who like Bloom is a Dublin Jew, tells his hilarious story of growing up Jewish in Dublin. The evening also includes a screening of Shalom Ireland, a documentary film about Jewish life in Ireland by Valerie Lappin Ganley, followed by a discussion. Adults $12. Studio Theatre, 235 Queens Quay, Harbourfront. June 14, 8 p.m.

Dress up in your bowlers, boaters and big hats for "Bloom On The Beaches," a joyous re-creation of Joyce's Ulysses with Toronto's Beach neighbourhood substituting for Dublin. Actors, musicians and singers lead a free literary and musical walkabout on June 16, 8:30 a.m. to noon, with readings at various venues and a concert at Kew Beach bandstand at 10:30 a.m. Assemble at Queen Car terminus at Neville Park at 8:30 a.m.

Readings from Ulysses take place at Chapters, 110 Bloor St. W., from 2 to 2:30 p.m.

On the evening of June 16, the "Bloomsday Gala" – "a rollicking, ribald, irreverent yet elegant Edwardian soiree" – features "dramatized readings from Joyce, parlour music, opera, ballads and a sing-along, performed by a superlative cast of actors, singers and musicians." Tickets $25 (including reception). St. Lawrence Hall, 157 King St. E. at Jarvis. 8p.m. 416-365-7877. www.pathcom.com/~livia

Strad in the Attic: If you have a violin, piano, guitar or other instrument collecting dust in your basement or attic, the Royal Conservatory of Music would like to hear from you. Instead of being neglected, donated instruments will be lovingly restored and placed into the hands of deserving students, to be played and treasured by a new generation of talented musicians.

Since it was launched last September, the Conservatory's "Strad in the Attic" program has already attracted instruments collectively worth more than $100,000, according to administrator David Visentin. Gifts so far include two Steinway grand pianos, a 300-year-old Amati violin from Italy, two 19th-century German cellos and a century-old European double bass and German accordian. Donors receive a tax receipt based on current market value as appraised by an independent local expert. Contact Visentin at 416-408-2824 ext. 725, or e-mail davidv@rcmusic.ca

Names in the News: As reported in last week's column, actor-director Richard Benjamin was a special guest at both the Toronto and Vancouver Jewish film festivals in May. In Vancouver, Benjamin and wife Paula Prentiss attended a screening of My Favorite Year, his 1982 directorial debut starring Peter O'Toole. Other big names to grace the Vancouver fest included Dr. Roberta Bondar, Canada's first woman in space, who introduced The First Israeli in Space, director Neil Weisbrod's homage to astronaut Ilan Ramon; and Canadian film director Ted Kotcheff, who attended a screening of his flick Joshua Then and Now based on the novel by Mordecai Richler... Speaking of Canada's jewel on the Pacific, Vancouverites get a rare opportunity next week to hear Neshama Carlebach, talented daughter of the legendary Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach, in a concert sponsored by the Or Shalom Community. Possessing her father's gifts for soul singing and storytelling, the charismatic performer appears at the Vancouver Rowing Club, Stanley Park on June 13, with tax-receipted tickets going for $75, students $36 (604-603-9262).

Lewi still affected by the horrors of Argentina's Dirty War

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Adriana Victoria Lewi was an infant in diapers when masked intruders abducted her beloved parents, Claudio and Ana Maria, in Buenos Aires in the autumn of 1978.

She never saw them again, and thereby hangs a tragic tale, recounted in a new documentary film, Looking for Victoria: An Argentine Story, screened at last month's Toronto Jewish Film Festival.

After gunmen burst into their apartment-cum hiding place, Claudio and Ana Maria, fervent opponents of the military junta that had seized power on March 24, 1976, were whisked away to a secret detention centre – one of hundreds scattered throughout the country – and interrogated, tortured and killed.

By all accounts, they were thrown out of an airplane after having been sedated, a cruel and unusual punishment the regime reserved for its most ardent, incorrigible enemies.

When they were kidnapped, Claudio was 23 and Ana Maria was 27, he a Jew and she a Catholic. As well as being science students at the University of Buenos Aires, they were members of the Monteneros, a far-left revolutionary group dedicated to the overthrow of the right-wing dictatorship.

The young, attractive couple, who were married about a month after the coup d'etat in Argentina, disappeared during the so-called Dirty War – the concerted campaign launched by the government to wipe out left-wing terrorism and crush political dissidents.

Human rights organizations estimate that between 9,000 to 30,000 Argentineans vanished without a trace during this terrible, turbulent period. The abductees were known as the desaparecidos. Upwards of 2,000 were Jewish.

Adriana Lewi was 18 months old when Claudio and Ana Maria were seized. She was turned over to her mother's parents, Juan Carlos and Victoria Sonder.

The Sonders, embarrassed by their daughter's association with the Monteneros and cowed by the repressive atmosphere of the day, passed their granddaughter off as their niece and never spoke about the events that rendered Lewi an orphan in literally one fell swoop.

"They were afraid," said Lewi, now a grown woman of 27, in an interview to promote Looking for Victoria, directed by Ton Vriens.

Claudio's parents, Cesar and Paulina, did not raise the subject either.

Although Lewi eventually learned of her parents' fate, she tried to repress their memory, pushing it into the deepest recesses of her mind.

But the impact of their gruesome deaths had a profound impact on her. "I didn't have a normal childhood. I was different."

Loneliness was her constant companion and crying fits were her demons. Nightmares roused Lewi from sleep and fellow pupils at school, being aware of her family history, generally shunned her.

At 12, she ran away from her grandparents, who had brought her up as a Catholic."They were really tough and mean to me," she said. "It was too hard living with them."

Lewi, who had a much better relationship with her paternal Jewish grandparents, found refuge in her mother's brother's home for the next four years. When she was 17, she left her uncle's home. Shortly afterward, she met Pablo, her boyfriend with whom she had a son, Frederico, now four years old. They were together for about a decade, until Pablo committed suicide.

During all these years, Lewi never came to terms with the enormity of her tragedy. "I was afraid I wouldn't be able to digest it all," she mused. "In Argentina, for many years, it was too dangerous to speak of this era."

In 2001, 18 years after democracy had been restored in Argentina and a national commission had been appointed to investigate the desaparecidos, she broke her silence. She told her story to an Israeli commission in Buenos Aires studying the Dirty War. "I needed to talk for the sake of my sanity."

Then she met Vriens, a New York-based Dutch filmmaker who had taken an interest in the Dirty War and hoped to make a film about it.

Vriens, who describes Lewi as "strong and feisty" and as "a real survivor," convinced her to face the past unflinchingly. "I was ready to help him. I was not afraid any more."

With Vriens constantly at her side, Lewi set out to determine what kind of individuals her parents had been and how they had spent their last months in captivity.

"She wondered whether they loved their ideology more than they loved her," said Vriens. "She discovered they loved her deeply."

Lewi, having met her parents' old friends, learned they had been Marxian idealists. In the film, a former Montenero fighter is quoted as saying that Claudio and Ana Maria dreamed of "a better world" and were not averse to using violence within the framework of an armed insurrection to achieve their utopian objectives. The movie claims that Claudio, a student of physics, built a bomb and ignited it in a failed attempt to kill a general.

Adriana Victoria Lewi holds a photograph of her late father, Claudio.

"They were fighting against oppression and poverty," Lewi said in an expression of understanding for her father's desperation. "They were trying to make people stand up for their rights."

As she plumbed deeper into their lives, Lewi also learned her atheistic parents would not have raised her as a Catholic and would have allowed her to choose her own faith had she been of a religious bent.

Today, she does not regard herself as a Catholic. "For the moment, I'm a woman of the world." But seconds later, she amended her statement. "I consider myself Jewish. I know I have a Jewish background, and I'm proud of it."

Last year, she was invited to attend a ceremony in Israel commemorating the desaparecidos, but she declined.

"I wanted to go, but it was shortly after Paulo's death, and I was depressed and having panic attacks," said Lewi, who, as a single mother, barely supports herself as a painter and graphic artist.

Still awakened by nightmares once or twice a week, Lewi believes Argentina has fallen far short of bringing full closure to the Dirty War era. "The persecutors have been set free. How can I be pleased with that? I want these people to be sent to prison. But in Argentina, you never know."

Though she was awarded a modest stipend by the government in recognition of her suffering, Lewi remains completely outraged by the crimes of that bygone but unforgotten epoch, which tore a deep gash in Argentina's body politic.

As a result, she is seriously considering the possibility of suing her parents' torturers. "They are free. I know their names."

Lewi is pleased that Argentina's current president, Nestor Kirchner, has decided to convert the Naval Mechanics School – the site of many of that era's abuses – into a Museum of Memory in honor of the desaparecidos.

It comes as no surprise to her that the United States condoned the junta's bloody campaign.

Declassified U.S. State Department documents reveal that the then U.S. secretary of state, Henry Kissinger, gave the Argentine generals the green light to launch a war against leftist terrorists and their sympathizers.

"The military system was tolerated by the United States," she said. "I'm angry with them."

She has nothing but praise for Looking for Victoria. "I liked it. I have a good feeling about it. We've had great feedback."

But the film has yet to be shown in Argentina. "We don't know when it will be screened," said Vriens. "People, in a way, are sick and tired of this era. It is not something they want to look into. Fear haunts Argentina. The torturers are still walking around."

Stories set in Israel of at least a generation ago

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Darkness, the fourth story in Avner Mandelman's new collection Cuckoo, tells the story of an Israeli woman who opposes her sister's romance with a Yemenite Jew and attains a Yemenite black-magic remedy to put an end to the match.

Told in the first person by the woman's young son, this short and simple reminiscence seems as charming and pregnant with possibilities as any of the masterful pieces in Isaac Bashevis Singer's In My Father's Court.

When I first read Darkness, the ending baffled me. After reading the story again, I called Mandelman, hoping he might illuminate it for me.

"Who knows? It's a mystery," he said. "I can guess how to resolve it, but my guess is as good as yours."

Like all 10 of the stories in Cuckoo, Darkness is set in the Israel of at least a generation ago: Mandelman was born there in 1947, served in the air force in the late 1960s (including during the Six Day War) and moved to Canada in 1973. A stock market speculator living in Toronto, he's also a prize-winning short-story writer who's been published in an impressive variety of publications.

A previous collection, Talking to the Enemy, won the Jewish Book Award for fiction.

Mandelman's tales usually rely on an irrepressible first-person narrator, often a son or nephew of the central character, who effervescently relates a series of remarkable happenings almost too incredible to be believed. Many revolve around relationship conundrums or triangles and quickly gather complications. The author is clearly fond of comically mismatched romances and entanglements of the sort found in A Midsummer Night's Dream.

In Mish-Mash, the initial problem is stated in the opening line: "In 1958 my uncle Nathan Berkovitch married two women and went to live with them both in Haifa until, a year after the weddings, a delegate from Haifa's rabbinate caught up with him because of an anonymous snitch, and told him he must divorce one of the two or go to jail."

In this story, the comic reversals, revelations and plot convolutions spill into a rabbinical beit din and threaten somehow to undo centuries of rabbinical decisions: "Before long there was shouting and screaming, accusations and counter-accusations and digging up of ancient quarrels, and also, shame to admit, tearing of hair, and even fisticuffs."

Ultimately a legendary rabbi possessing Solomonic wisdom puts a brilliant end to this seemingly impossible dispute.

Mandelman is clearly an expert at developing complex plots and then resolving them by clever and often funny means. In Cuckoo (the title story) and Take-Down, both of which appeared earlier in the Parchment journal of Canadian Jewish literature, he utilizes this formula to achieve the usual dynamic and comic results, which sometimes verge on farce.

His concern with Jewish Halachah, ritual, custom, sayings and superstition is never more evident than in stories like Curse and Dybbuk, which centre around aspects of Jewish magical and mystical lore. In a few instances, however, his compression of and cleverness with plot detract from the characterizations. Since Avraham Schlein, the lead character in Dybbuk, seems little more than an empty cipher, is it any wonder he becomes possessed?

Two stories reveal a markedly different form. Told entirely through dialogue, Authorization focuses on the closed hearing of a special operative in Israel's secret service who has decided, for humanitarian reasons, not to take down a terrorist as planned. Og, told in the "objective" style of third-person narration, is a historical-biblical sketch about Israel's use of an alien army to commit barbaric acts. Is this a tale of ancient hypocrisy or a modern allegory? Your guess is as good as mine.

Mandelman, who earned a creative writing degree from San Francisco State University in 1993, said he can knock off a short story in a surprisingly short time. "A couple of hours or a day – it's not difficult," he said. "It's like brain surgery. You have to study 15 years first, but then the operation takes only three hours."

Getting published, however, is not always that easy. After he received a cheque from an Israeli publisher for a first novel, the publisher's female editors and translators objected strongly to some of his characters, but the author refused to make changes. "The chief editor called me and said, 'I have a rebellion on my hands. Keep the money and take back the book.'"

The experience has left him somewhat wary, he said. "The problem is, if you really agitate the reader, you also agitate the editor, and then it gets difficult finding a publisher."

Although he's presently finishing a second novel, he isn't about to give up his day job as a money manager. "I do this to supplement my writing income," he said. "Writing pays about seven cents an hour. I'm about six-foot-six and I need to eat, so I have to work."

Cuckoo, by Avner Mandelman, was published by Oberon Press. The hardcover edition sells for $38.95, the softcover for $18.95.

Simchovitch wins prize for Yiddish writing

The prize for scholarship on a Jewish subject went to Loren Lerner, editor of Afterimage: Evocations of the Holocaust in Contemporary Canadian Arts and Literature, published by the Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies at Concordia University.

Simcha Simchovitch won the prize for writing in Yiddish and in Yiddish translation for two books: Dem Netzach Antkegn: Gezamlte Lider, and Out of the Abyss: Collected Poems (Simchovitch Book Fund).

The poetry prize went to Merle Nudelman for her first volume, Borrowed Light (Guernica), which Fuerstenberg described as "a collection that is full of Yiddishkeit and love for Jewish tradition."

Fuerstenberg, who founded the Jewish Book Awards 16 years ago, was unaware that a 10th prize was to be awarded. Committee member Bernard Katz presented him with a trophy commemorating "his many outstanding contributions to Jewish books and literature."

Although the former Ryerson literature professor and current director of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto says he's ready to step down as chair of the book awards, he's still bursting with ideas about its future. For one thing, he'd like to see it raise an endowment of $1 million, so it can offer the sort of large prizes that make headlines and generate excitement. (At present, most winners receive a cheque for $500 or $1,000.)

The need to give recognition and support to Canada's isolated Diaspora of Jewish writers is paramount, Fuerstenberg said.

"Writers can't work in a vacuum. They need response. They need to see a reaction. And the reaction teaches them for the next work."

Breast cancer survivor creates elegant fashion concept

By ELAINE COHEN
Business and Supplements Co-ordinator

MONTREAL – For a woman who has undergone a masectomy, finding an appropriate negligee can be daunting.

"There is no problem finding a bra or bathing suit that has pockets for prostheses," says native Montrealer Ann Silverstone, a breast cancer survivor.

"If the bra is worn under clothing, it looks fine and nobody can tell the difference."

Nevertheless, Silverstone, 51, laments about the dearth of alluring lingerie. "Lingerie in general is either see-through or has a place for two breasts. Most styles have to be pulled over the head and that's a strain after surgery."

Determined to overcome this obstacle, Silverstone invented a new fashion concept. She coined it the "Notti" and it's more than just lingerie.

"The Notti allows you to feel sexy without having to wear a prosthesis simply by its styling and material," Silverstone says. "After all, who wants to wear a prosthesis when they are being intimate?"

The one-piece soft, body-hugging Notti is mid-thigh length. It flatters the figure. Whether the woman has undergone a mastectomy or has other esthetic concerns, the Notti is pleasing to the eye and feels luxurious.

The washable fabric is a nylon-spandex blend. The garment is manufactured in Canada and is available online. The Notti ranges in size from extra small to extra large. Consumers have a choice of colours and styles. For information, visit the website (http://www.nottiwear.com) or phone (613) 299-3194.

"It's meant for intimate relations with your partner," Silverstone says. "It's an even playing field because any woman can wear a Notti. What's more, she can leave it on during intimacy."

The Notti ties over one shoulder. The term Notti has a few connotations. Notti is a play on words for "naughty." It ties in a "knot." Notti also means "nights" in Italian.

Diagnosed with breast cancer in 2001, Silverstone had a radical lumpectomy followed by chemotherapy. Seven months later, she had a mastectomy and radiation.

Silverstone points out that most of the literature and discussions about sexual intimacy after a mastectomy focus on two issues. One is having a communicative and understanding partner and the other is accepting your new body. What she didn't find was advice on how to "feel" sexy with a scar and a missing breast.

"My husband was extremely supportive and very understanding right from the start," Silverstone relates. "I was the one with the problem. The Notti solved the problem. It enabled me to keep my scar covered, be comfortable and feel sexy all at the same time."

As founder of Feel Sexy Again, Silverstone says it's gratifying to receive positive feedback from women of all ages. Initially, Silverstone fashioned the Notti for herself. "It worked so well for me that I decided to share my secret, so others could benefit." Without any corporate backing, Silverstone founded Feel Sexy Again, through which she sells her lingerie.

Silverstone resides in Ottawa with her husband, Jack, and their three children, ages 12-22. Trained in social work, she served two years as director of Hillel campuses for the University of Ottawa, Carleton University and Algonquin College.

Now that she has launched Feel Sexy Again, Silverstone is busy honing her business skills. Recently, she presented her "Notti" to cancer support groups in Ontario.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. I know olive oil is heart healthy. What type should I buy?

A. Buy extra virgin olive oil for use in salad dressings, on veggies, etc., because it has the most flavour. Buy the first-pressed variety (extra virgin) because it is not chemically processed in most cases. Buy olive oil that is produced and bottled in the same country. Note that light olive oil refers only to the colour or flavour. All olive oil is 100 per cent fat and contains 14 grams of fat per tablespoon.

Q. I have been reading a lot about the glycemic index (GI), and I am wondering if brown rice is a much lower GI food than white rice?

A. Actually white rice is very high, but converted rice is lowest, brown and long-grain rice fall in the middle.

Q. I have been buying more organic produce lately. Does it still need to be washed?

A. Absolutely. All fruits and vegetables should be very thoroughly washed before being consumed. Good for you for getting into organics.

Q. I drink two cups of coffee a day and really enjoy it. I am wondering if this is bad for me.

A. The real issue with coffee as I see it is twofold: if you're drinking a lot of coffee, you're not drinking other things like water or milk. Also I always ask my patients this question when they ask if coffee is okay: Could you go a day without it? If you say yes, then you merely enjoy it and it's not so bad. If you say no, then I believe it may be having an alternative effect and should be eliminated. You'll have withdrawal symptoms for about a week and then feel great.

Q. My three-year-old loves milk and I know it's healthy, but I wonder if he's drinking too much. How much is enough?
